I. GENERAL INTRODUCTION

DEVELOPMENT OF THE IMPERIAL COINAGE UNDER THE FLAVIANS: MINTS: PROVINCIAL AND LOCAL COINAGE.

HAD the second imperial dynasty followed peacefully on the first, a quiet continuation of the imperial tradition would have been the only thing to expect. But, born as it was out of storm and confusion, the Flavian dynasty had first to find its way back to peace and stability. It was a question, how far it would revert to the established practice of the Julio-Claudian line.

The coinage of Vespasian rises directly out of the Civil Wars, when the balance of the Empire was disturbed, when Rome was not, for the moment, the one centre of gravity, and when the provinces, owing to the exceptional circumstances of the time, enjoyed an unusual importance. Vespasian's first issues were naturally in the East—at Antioch and Alexandria, the two great cities that declared at once for him. A little later begins a great issue in or near the province of Asia, marking the mustering of forces by Mucianus. The armies of Illyricum are represented by a small and short-lived coinage, perhaps struck at Aquileia. Then, a little later again, as Spain and Gaul declare for Vespasian, Tarraco and Lugdunum strike for their new master. Rome, which only fell into the hands of the Flavians on 21 December 69, is almost the last mint to begin striking for Vespasian.

As for Galba and Vitellius, so too for Vespasian all these issues were something in the nature of emergency coinage. Both Galba and Vitellius, once masters of the capital, had begun to suspend their provincial issues. Would Vespasian do the same? Would he restore Rome to its old supremacy or would he allow the provincial mints of the Civil Wars to develop into regular auxiliaries of the Roman mint?

For a few years there might have been some doubt as to Vespasian's ultimate intentions. The mint of Lugdunum was working vigorously in A.D. 71 and 72, the mint of Tarraco, if less active, was at least still in being. In the East we find the coinage of the Asia district extending down to A.D. 76, the coinage of the Syrian down to A.D. 72. The coinage of aes, as opposed to gold and silver, was hardly carried on abroad after A.D. 72, except at the one mint of Lugdunum, which has a large issue for Vespasian and his sons in the years A.D. 77 and 78.

But when we study the closing phase of Vespasian's policy and pursue it into the reigns of his sons, we see that there was a definite return to the mint policy of the later years of Nero. Gold and silver of the imperial denominations is to be reserved for Rome; for aes the senatorial mint of Rome is to be assisted by the auxiliary mint of Lugdunum, which is primarily responsible for the supply of the Western provinces. For the provincial coinages in the precious metals, A.D. 69 to 76, there were certainly special causes of a temporary character. The war on the Rhine fully accounts for the activity of Lugdunum. In the East, the cradle of Vespasian's power, political considerations may have played a part; but here too the creation of a big new military command in Cappadocia may have required special coinage.

The reigns of Titus and Domitian have little novelty to show. The mint of Lugdunum struck aes down to the second year of Domitian, but then, apparently, closed down. The senatorial mint of Rome must have been enlarged to bear the new burden then laid upon it. In the precious metals there are no provincial issues in the Latin language, with the exception of the cistophoric tetradrachms of Asia Minor.

It is perhaps well to pause here for a moment to consider whether there is a flaw in our method of studying mints. Did Rome normally strike in company with a number of provincial branch mints? And do we only recognize this work on the exceptional occasions when they diverge from the Roman norm? It may, of course, be pleaded that there were great practical conveniences in striking bullion into coin locally, instead of importing it to Rome for re-export abroad, and that, therefore, the Romans probably employed the modern method of striking coins all of one identical pattern from a number of local mints. The only difference would be that modern mints as a rule sign with distinguishing letters or symbols, whereas the Romans did not. All that can be said at present in answer to such a plea is that, although the possibility exists, there appears to be no positive evidence in favour of it, and that, for the time, it is simpler to work on the easier hypothesis of a single mint representing a single style in the coins. Later, in the second century, there is definite evidence against this view. If there were provincial branch mints in A.D. 193, Antioch and Lugdunum must surely have been among them. If that had been the case, the first issues of Antioch for Pescennius Niger and of Lugdunum for Clodius Albinus would have been bound to retain some trace of such former co-operation with Rome; as it is, they show none—their style is original and inferior.

On the relations of the two mints, the imperial and senatorial in Rome, our period may perhaps throw some light. Under the Republic, the senatorial mint was in the temple of Juno Moneta on the Capitol, under Trajan we find the imperial mint in the fifth region near the Baths of Trajan. Are we to suppose that by the time of Trajan the senatorial mint had joined the imperial at this new site, and that the appearance of the type of Moneta August. on aes of Domitian in A.D. 84 marks the exact date of the change? The evidence is fragmentary and indecisive: but there is enough to suggest that in A.D. 69 the senatorial mint was still on the Capitol and that it reopened there after the restoration, in A.D. 71. Whether, after the great fire of A.D. 81, the senatorial mint was united with the imperial is less certain. We have here adopted the view that it continued separate: but the alternative view has some points in its favour and can, at any rate, hardly be disproved.¹

In the West local and provincial coinage was completely at an end; after the opening of the mint of Lugdunum for aes by Nero, even the local imitations of Roman money cease. The fact that they do not recommence, when the mint of Lugdunum was closed by Domitian, suggests that Rome was now sufficient to bear the whole burden of the West.

In the East, there was little change from the conditions sketched in Vol. I. The great issues of Alexandria and Antioch continued, in the same denominations as before. Tetradrachms of the Syrian standard were also struck by Vespasian at Tyre (?) and in Cyprus, and by Domitian at Tarsus. The great mint of Caesarea in Cappadocia continued to strike didrachms, drachms, and hemidrachms, but the legend is now invariably in Greek and the coins fall outside the imperial series. In Asia the cistophoric tetradrachms continued to appear. Under Vespasian, however, the issue was very small: only one specimen is known up to date. The issue of imperial denarii in the province seems to have taken its place.

The coinage of the vassal kingdom of Commagene ceases with the fall of the dynasty and aes coinage with Latin legend inaugurates the incorporation of the district in Syria. Lycia, now part of a Roman province, has its own silver drachms under Domitian. In the general arrangements for coinage no changes of importance in principle were made. It may be noted that, except in Bosphorus, the coinage of vassal-kingdoms was now almost at an end.

THE MONETARY SYSTEM.

DENOMINATIONS, WEIGHTS, AND METALS.

There was no important modification in this period of the system founded by Augustus and reformed by Nero. The aureus of the heavier weight (prior to Nero's reform) was struck very occasionally by Vespasian at Syrian mints, but regularly by Domitian from A.D. 82 to the close of his reign.² The gold quinarius in this period was a rare coin. In the denarius a small but quite definite increase in weight and fineness (?) is to be observed under Domitian. The silver quinarius was re-introduced and was struck, relatively speaking, in plenty. The large gold and silver pieces of Domitian, usually called 'medallions', were struck as coin denominations, but in small numbers and for special occasions.

² These aurei of Domitian were popularly known as 'domini' ('sovereigns') or 'flavi' ('yellow-boys'): cf. Martial, iv, 28, 5 'et centum dominos novae monetae', and xii, 65, 6 'an de moneta Caesaris decem flavos'.

In the aes, the five denominations—sestertius, dupondius, As, semis, and quadrans—continue to be struck, the As and quadrans in copper, the other three in brass. The dupondius is normally distinguished from the As by the radiate crown: but the laureate crown also appears on dupondii of Vespasian of the Lugdunum mint.

THE INNER WORKING OF THE MINT.

The problem of the two authorities in Roman Coinage, Emperor and Senate, has already been touched on above; we have suggested that the Senate continued to hold the nominal control over the aes even under Domitian, but we can readily believe that it made little difficulty about carrying out the Emperor's suggestions. The restored series of Titus and Domitian certainly show us Emperor and Senate co-operating over an issue of aes. But this is quite in accordance with the theory, developed in Vol. I,² that the aes coinage is issued for the Roman State, S. P. Q. R., by the senior partner, the Senate, the people being represented by the

² B. M. C., Emp., i, pp. xvi f.

Emperor as holder of the tribunician power. On the internal organization of the mints, there is nothing to add to the section in Vol. I.¹

The restoration series deserve mention in this context, inasmuch as they preserve the continuity of the coinage, keeping well-known types in circulation. It seems certain that the aes wore out very rapidly; coins of Claudius seem to have been going out of use by the year A. D. 80.²

The countermark of Vespasian, , on aes of Nero of Lugdunum mint was in all probability affixed in the early days of Vespasian's triumph in the West.³ The countermark IMP VES, (MP VES), found very rarely on denarii from about 120 B. C. to Augustus, apparently marks worn pieces for continued circulation.⁴ This shows us that the old silver coinage was fast wearing out and prepares us for the action of Trajan in melting it down in A. D. 107.

In this period begin to appear, very rarely, and only on the aes, combinations of two obverses or two reverses to make up one coin.⁵ In the second century these pieces become more numerous and reach their maximum under the reign of Commodus. No convincing explanation has yet been offered—unless indeed they are no more than curiosities of the mint, whether produced by accident or by design.

Plated denarii, often hybrid in character, that is to say, combining obverses and reverses that are strictly speaking incompatible, are particularly common in this period. Now that the government avowedly alloyed its silver, it had no motive for plating; we may safely assign these plated coins to false moneyers, who, naturally, were not concerned to observe the rules of the mints and therefore produced amazing combinations of types. The elimination of these forgeries from the series is essential to the study of the period.

There is no very original development of art or fabric. There is no violent transition at Rome from the reigns of Nero and his successors; but the touch of beauty and originality, which is so marked on Nero's later coinage, is no longer apparent, and we should be inclined to conjecture that one or more artists of special ability had died or been dismissed. The coinage of A. D. 71, particularly the aes, includes some work

³ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, pp. xxxi ff.

⁴ Cp. Bahrfeldt in Z. f. N., 1876, pp. 354 ff., and, more fully, 1887, pp. 67 ff. Bahrfeldt quotes the finding of two such countermarked denarii in a hoard of the reign of Trajan.

A similar countermark IMP VESP AVG (MP VES AC), not IMP VESPNC, as it has been read, occurs on a cistophoric tetradrachm of Claudius (Z. f. N., 1876, p. 354, n. 1) and of Augustus (B. M. C., Emp., i, p. xxviii: the coin there quoted is now in Berlin, and Dr. Regling has given us the corrected reading). The Rev. E. A. Sydenham has a tetradrachm of Claudius with countermark IM SER (for Galba?).

of high distinction, well above the average of the reign, which must be attributed to special artists imported for the occasion. The later coinage of Vespasian shows refinement and subtlety in its portraiture, but a lack of breadth and strength. Similar tendencies rule the whole reign of Titus and the early years of Domitian. From about A.D. 83, however, Domitian seems to have introduced artists who treated his own fine features with fitting distinction and designed some effective types for the large field of the sestertius.

The local mints will be characterized in their places and need not detain us long here. Tarraco shows marked originality and even beauty. An odd tendency to elongate the figures of the reverse is still noticeable. Lugdunum shows a marked style of its own that is full of character, though clumsy and ponderous. Illyricum shows some strength and originality, but lack of experience and skill. The issues of the Asia district are, on the whole, neat and fine in a not too robust way. Further south, Antioch and Alexandria are both rough and awkward, whereas Tyre has a meticulous refinement of its own. The aes of Commagene maintains a good Roman standard: the dies, if not made at Rome, were closely copied from Roman models.

As regards epigraphy, closed is now commoner than the open form A. Closed P becomes common, but not to the exclusion of the form P. Apexed letters are common at some mints, e.g. Lugdunum, and such forms as N, V for N and V are met with at Rome and elsewhere. Irregularities are not uncommon at the local mints: at Tarraco, for example, a double stroke for a single is not uncommon, e.g. II for I. The form Q for G is no longer found in Asia, though another odd form, C, occurs at Tyre. The form RESVRGES for RESVRGENS is found for Vespasian. In general, it is safe to say that epigraphy is valuable as a criterion of mintage, but that the differences which have to be observed are subtle and hard to reduce to rules—consisting as they do in slight variations of size of letters, spacing, and minute varieties of form, which, though they seem to vanish on close analysis, yet do make some general impression on the eye.

TYPES AND LEGENDS

As in Vol. I, the detailed study of types and legends is reserved for the special Introductions: only some more general problems are considered here. It will not be necessary, as there, to distinguish the metals in this section.

The Obverse Type.

The normal obverse is of course the head or bust of the reigning Emperor, usually laureate, less commonly bare, radiate only on the dupondius. The direction is commonly to the right, though busts to the left are not rare. The neck is usually undraped. Vespasian occasionally wears the paludamentum, Titus and Domitian the cuirass; Domitian, as Emperor, normally wears the aegis, the attribute of his patroness, Minerva. The globe below the bust—a symbol of world-power—still occurs occasionally at Lugdunum and Tarraco.

The princes of the Flavian house share in the right of coinage, Domitian almost as freely as Titus, who was actually colleague. Even as 'princeps iuventutis' Domitian normally wears the laureate wreath, but he does not wear the radiate crown on the dupondius. There are coins of Julia under Titus, of Julia and of Domitia under Domitian—both bearing the title of Augusta.

Commemorative coins are a feature of the period. We begin with rare aurei of Divus Augustus struck for Vespasian in Spain: then follow coins in all metals in honour of Galba, who, however, does not bear the title of 'Divus'. Titus strikes for his father on his consecration—the form 'Divus Augustus Vespasianus' seems intended to draw a comparison with 'Divus Augustus' himself. He also strikes coins for his mother, Domitilla—possibly also for his sister of the same name. Domitian, who built a temple to the gens Flavia, seems to have claimed immortality as a prerogative of his house. Divus Vespasianus and Diva Domitilla, Divus Titus, Divus Caesar—the son lost in infancy—later, Diva Iulia are all honoured. The radiate crown is, as before, a symbol of consecration, but the laureate wreath is also found.

The restored series of Titus and Domitian reproduce the types of the original coins, including a number of portraits of the early Empire.

A few exceptional obverses deserve special notice:

(1) The very rare denarius of Vespasian, of Republican pattern, with obverse, Head of Sol.

(2) In the restoration series, in some cases at least, the large S.C. surrounded by legend of the Emperor must be considered the true obverse.

(3) The quadrans normally lacks the portrait of Emperor or prince, and has instead the head of a divinity (e.g. Apollo or Ceres) or some such type as palm-tree or trophy.

The Obverse Legend (sometimes continued on the reverse).

A short study of the component parts of the imperial title, which forms the normal obverse legend, may be instructive.

(a) Imperator. This title, indicative of the chief military command, is used distinctively as praenomen by all the Flavian Emperors: its omission is distinctly rare. Vespasian and Domitian commonly combine it with the dynastic title of Caesar, borrowed from the Julio-Claudian line, to form the prelude to their title. Titus places his own personal name between the Imp. and the Caesar. Domitian as prince has no claim to the title, but Titus in his father's reign occasionally uses it as praenomen in the East, and in Rome regularly incorporates it, in original fashion, in the body of his name. The use of imperator as cognomen with number of acclamation is rare under Vespasian (and there chiefly on the reverse), but general on the reverse under Titus and Domitian.

(b) The Emperor's names. The praenomen is only used by Titus, who adopted it as his distinctive name. The nomen 'Flavius' only occurs on rare Eastern coins of Titus, struck under Vespasian. Vespasian and Domitian both adopt their cognomina as distinctive names. We have already noticed the adoption of the dynastic name of Caesar. While incorporated as part of the Emperor's title, it also serves to mark the prince as heir. For Domitian it is used as a praenomen, just like our 'Prince'.

(c) Augustus. This remains the distinctive imperial title: it is not borne by Titus or Domitian under Vespasian, or by Domitian under Titus. It is given to Galba in his posthumous issues in the same way that it is generally retained for the 'divus'. Augusta is given as title of honour to ladies of the imperial house.

(d) Pontifex Maximus. Great prominence continues to be given to this title, which represents the Emperor as head of Roman religion. It is commonly incorporated in the title, occasionally used as sole legend of the reverse.

(e) Tr(ibunicia) P(otestate): the full form in the ablative occurs exceptionally on an aureus of Vespasian. The title is used throughout by Vespasian, the numbered power seldom, whereas Titus and Domitian normally number their regnal years thus.

(f) Cos., Cos. II, III, Cos. Des., &c. All the Flavians showed a definite predilection for the chief office in the state. Domitian held it more often than any other Emperor. The office is normally recorded, very often as main legend of the reverse.

(g) Censor. The title is borne by Vespasian and Titus during their censorship, and by Domitian after his assumption of the office permanently. 'Cens. pot.' represents 'Censoria potestate', 'Cens. per.' 'Censor perpetuus'.

(h) Pater patriae. Accepted and borne by all the Flavians. Vespasian has it on the aes, but seldom on the gold and silver. The title, never borne by Galba in his lifetime, was apparently bestowed on him posthumously.

(i) Titles of relationship are now the rule. The princes are both 'Augusti f.', later 'Divi f.', Julia under Domitian is 'Divi Titi filia'.

(j) Military titles of honour. Neither Vespasian nor Titus adopted the name of 'Iudaicus' in honour of the Jewish triumph: but, after the victory over the Chatti in A.D. 83, Domitian adopted the proud name of Germanicus, with its illustrious memories from the early Empire, and thenceforward chose to be called by it. He was probably conscious of a desire to be assimilated to Germanicus, the darling of the Roman people.

The title of princeps iuventutis is used by Domitian, as expressing one of the prime qualifications of the heir apparent. In other small points there is no marked divergence from the rules observed in Vol. I.

Reverse Types and Legends.

We find ourselves now in the full development of the imperial coinage. Types of gods and virtues provide a convenient symbolism to cover almost every possible feature of the national life. More direct references to current events are especially common on the aes, where the large flan of the sestertius lent itself to the representation of groups. The introduction of the person of the Emperor links the ideal world of divinity to the everyday life of man. The type of the 'captive province' is a creation of this period, called forth by the Jewish triumph of Vespasian and Titus and the Chattan triumph of Domitian. The natural and obvious symbolism of animate and inanimate types is fully developed, as for example in the types of country life from Vespasian's later years.

The revival of earlier types, whether on coins definitely marked as 'restored' or on ordinary issues, is a feature of the age. We may see in it the natural conservatism of a people that loved tradition and the conscious conservatism of a government, seeking to link itself to an honoured past. As is only natural, however, the restored type may chance to convey some additional meaning.

As regards special denominations, the victoriate retains its normal Victory type, but under Domitian occasionally borrows one from the general coinage. The quadrans invariably omits the imperial portrait. It was probably treated as an urban coinage of Rome and as such reserved to the senate.

The view of the imperial virtues put forward in Vol. I (pp. lxxiii ff.), has met with some friendly criticism, and it seems advisable therefore to submit it to further examination. Let us take again the case of 'Pax Augusta' and 'Pax Augusti'. 'Pax Augusta', as all will agree, must mean 'the Peace of the Empire' 'the Augustan Peace'. Is 'Pax Augusti' only another way of saying the same thing? Representations of the Emperor holding the branch of peace are not uncommon on coins: he is represented, that is to say, as 'pacifer'. What then can 'Pax Augusti' be, if not the quality in the Emperor which entitles him to that epithet? A passage in Statius (Thebaid x. 632 ff.), seems to lead us very near the heart of the matter. Virtus, 'the goddess throned hard by Jupiter, glides down to earth, whether the almighty father bestows her, or whether she of her own will finds her way into hearts that can receive her'. So, too, when Trajan, interrogating Saint Ignatius, the 'Christ-bearer', says ἡμεῖς οὖν σοι δοκοῦμεν κατὰ νοῦν μὴ ἔχειν θεοῦς, οἷς καὶ χρώμεθα συμμάχοις πρὸς τοὺς πολεμίους,¹ it is of these virtues rather than of the

Olympian gods that he is thinking. The virtues then are divine powers, which can under favourable conditions obtain access to the minds of men and raise them heavenward. It need hardly be added that the Emperors are regarded as pre-eminently men of this class. The virtue followed by the Emperor's name then denotes as a rule the divine quality active in and through the Emperor. Whether or not there are exceptions to this rule will need careful inquiry: 'Salus Augusti', for example, certainly seems more naturally to express 'The Salvation', 'The Health of the Emperor', than 'The Saving Spirit of the Emperor'. But even here the difference is a vanishing one. For a Spirit of Salvation working in the Emperor will make him 'salvus' as well as his people.

The legend of the reverse is usually either a description of the type or a continuation of the imperial legend of the obverse. In the former case the legend is commonly in the nominative—probably a deictic nominative, like that in the title of a picture. The dative, too, is far from unusual: that it is a dative of dedication is proved by such reverses as PROVIDENT(iae) or SALVTI AVGVSTI with an altar. A possessive genitive FELICITA·REDVCIS occurs exceptionally under Vespasian at Lugdunum. The accusative, governed presumably by a verb understood, is only found at Vespasian's mint of Illyricum (PACIS EVENTVM, GENIVM P·R·). The legends of Domitian's coins of the Secular Games make up definite sentences: whilst the twin coins of Vespasian and Galba, with legends CONCORDIA SENATVI and SENATVS PIETATI AVGVSTI, certainly must be completed with verbal ideas understood. Complete absence of legend is uncommon, unless we include here those numerous sestertii, many of them showing groups, in which the only legend is the mark of authority, S·C·. The use of the imperial title as reverse legend is characteristic, in particular, of the gold and silver of Titus and Domitian.¹ There is perhaps a trace of self-glorification on the part of the Emperor. But we must remember that the Imperial titles formed the most satisfactory method of dating then in general use, and that the coins were specially well suited to spread a correct knowledge of those titles. Unfortunately, the engravers of inscriptions did not always profit by their opportunities.

FINDS

The finds buried during this period are neither numerous nor very important historically, but a short account of a few may be of interest.

At Bosco Reale near Pompeii were discovered on 13 April 1895 more than one thousand Roman aurei, together with gold and silver ornaments, cups, &c. All reigns from Augustus to Vespasian were represented. The coins of Augustus and Tiberius were very much worn, from Nero onwards the preservation was good (R. N., 1895, pp. 574 ff.).

¹ But not of the aes. The appearance of such titles on aes of the first two years of Domitian is one evidence the more that the coinage of those two years was irregular.

In the neighbourhood of Naples were found in 1868 over one thousand Roman aurei from the reign of Augustus to that of Domitian. The coins of Augustus and Tiberius were very much worn. The latest dated coins were of the year A.D. 88-9 (P. N. S., 1868, pp. 75 ff.).

In Pudukota in South India were found in 1898 five hundred and one aurei, extending from Augustus to Vespasian. The reign of Tiberius was particularly well represented. Of the coins four hundred and sixty-one were defaced by stabs on the obverse portrait, presumably to put them out of circulation (Num. Chr., 1898, pp. 304 ff., 1899, pp. 81 ff.).

Near the Thames at Southwark were found in 1902 seventeen Roman aes coins from Claudius to Vespasian (but including an As of Agrippa). The eleven coins of Nero were all of Lugdunum mint, and so were the two of Vespasian (Num. Chr., 1903, pp. 92 ff.).

Of the Corbridge find which extends over this period we have already spoken in Vol. I (p. lxxviii).

FORGERIES

The only addition to be made to the general account of Roman forgeries in Vol. I is that the Numismatic Institute in Italy is in possession of a large number of false dies, which it is hoping to publish at an early date.

A few unusual forgeries in the Museum collection may be quoted: (1) a cistophoric tetradrachm of Titus, obv. IMP. T. CAES. F. VESP. AVG. P. M. TR. C. S. III, radiate l., rev. S. Newton, The Epigraphic Evidence for the Reigns of Vespasian and Titus, Ithaca, New York, 1901. The exact occasions of the acclamations are, in many cases, anything but certain. I is for accession, 1 July 69, II for Cremona, late October 69; III may be for the storm of Jerusalem, IIII and V for Gallic victories—all in A.D. 70; Imp. VI is probably for a Gallic victory in 71; Imp. VII (= Titus Imp.) may be for the triumph of Vespasian and Titus; VIII for successes of Lucilius Bassus in Judaea; Imp. VIII is probably for the annexation of Commagene in 72; Imp. X for the capture of Mazada in 73; Imp. XI-XVI are all doubtful—we think of campaigns in Britain and on the Rhine; Imp. XVII, XVIII may be for Syrian successes against the Parthians; while Imp. XIX and XX are probably for Agricola's victories in Britain.

⁷ Dessau, op. cit., i, p. 68, No. 247 and notes, Vespasian is Imp. X, Cos. IIII, Cens. Desig.: other inscriptions show Vespasian as censor, while still Tr. P. IIII (before 1 July 73; cp. C. I. L., v, 4312) and Titus similarly censor, while still Tr. P. II. Censorinus, De die nat. c. 18, places the ending of the lustrum in A.D. 74. The sestertius of Titus in B.M. with Imp. IIII Tr. Attribution and Style.

Vespasian's earliest coins of Rome can be readily identified by a comparison with Roman issues of Vitellius: the first portrait of Vespasian is, in fact, barely distinguishable from the last of his predecessor. Following the hints supplied by portraiture, legends, and style, we can then trace the history of the mint throughout the reign. The Eastern coinages betray themselves by tricks of style that are new to the Roman imperial series; for the Western mints we have issues of Galba and Vitellius to guide us. The only serious doubts that arise are concerned with the early Roman issues of aes and with the closing of the mints of Tarraco and Lugdunum. The Senatorial mint of Rome probably suffered in the great fire of December 69. Undoubted Roman issues of 69-70 are quite rare, and it is probable that a number of coins, which from the excellence of their style might be thought to be of Rome, are, as a matter of fact, rather of Gallic mintage. In A.D. 71 the mint was again in full working order, and, after the great issues of that year from Lugdunum and Tarraco,³ only the mint of Lugdunum continued to share with Rome the task of supplying the West with aes. The issue of gold and silver from Lugdunum and Tarraco seems to stop abruptly in the course of the year 73. There are, however, coins which combine characteristics of one or other of those mints with characteristics of Rome, and this fact confirms us in the view, in itself probable enough, that, on the closing of the Western mints, there was some transference of staff to Rome, which has left its mark on the style of the capital. By the end of the reign the gold and silver flows in a single channel. There are no aurei or denarii to correspond to the later Lugdunum issues of aes; Lugdunum, in fact, is again, as under Nero, only a branch of the Senatorial mint.

³ Coins attributed to Tarraco, A.D. 71-72, show some approximation to Roman models. The distinctive Spanish element, however, predominates.

The posthumous issues of Galba, so far as they have yet been identified, were probably not struck at Rome at all.¹

Roman coins of the reign in all metals are distinguished by fine realistic portraits,² usually in fairly high relief, by well-proportioned figures on the reverse and by firm, bold lettering, well spaced out. The unbarred A is common, particularly early in the reign; the closed P (or nearly closed P) is normal. There is considerable development in the course of the reign, particularly on the gold and silver; the later portraits are more delicate than the earlier and the lettering is smaller, neater, and more given to flourishes. The variety of busts in simultaneous use suggests a definite division of the mint into officinae.

Chronology.

The general chronology is assured by the sequence of imperial titles, though, in a few cases, the exact dates are matter of discussion.³ The undated coins can all be placed within fairly narrow limits by comparison with the dated.

A, A. The direction of the legends is a useful aid to dating. The obverse reads inwardly, from l. to r., A.D. 69-73, outwardly from r. to l., A.D. 73-79. The reverse reads inwardly, from l. to r., A.D. 69-73, outwardly, from r. to l., A.D. 73-74, then again inwardly, from l. to r., A.D. 74-79.

The first issue is of Vespasian only, with obv. IMP. CAESAR VESPASIANVS AVG., and runs from December 69 to November 70. Later reverse types (e.g. FIDES PVBL.) only occur on ancient forgeries or coins of the Lugdunum mint (e.g. COS. III FORT. RED). A large part of the issue is dated to A.D. 70 (COS. ITER. on rev.), but a few coins with a portrait hardly to be distinguished from that of Vitellius may belong to the last days of December 69. For the denarius, with obv. head of Sol, see below on types, p. xxxiv.

The second issue, with obv. IMP. CAES. VESP. AVG. P. M., begins with Vespasian's election as 'pontifex maximus' in November 70 and runs till the end of 71. Reverses with TRI. POT. II are earlier than 1 July 70; reverses with COS. IIII probably occur on ancient forgeries only. The first issue of Titus may perhaps overlap the end of this.

The third issue, with obv. IMP. CAES. VESP. AVG. P. M. COS. IIII, is mainly of the year 72, but embraces the first months of 73, before Vespasian and Titus became censors.⁴ The Jewish triumph of June 71 figures largely on the reverses—the coins commemorating this following more than six months after the event. Parallel to this issue runs the first of Titus, with the title TR. P., first conferred on 1 July 71; the reverses, however, seem to be mainly at least of 72.

The fourth issue, with obv. IMP. CAES. VESP. AVG. P. M. COS. IIII CENS., can only have run for a very short time after July (?) 73, as we have still to find room in this year for the larger fifth issue, with obv. IMP. CAES. VESP. AVG. CEN. (or CENS.). Parallel to the fourth issue runs the second of Titus, with obv. T. CAES. IMP. VESP. PON. TR. POT.¹ CENS., parallel to the fifth the third of Titus with obv. T. CAES. IMP. VESP. CENS. The first issue of Domitian, with COS. II on obverse, probably runs through the whole year.

To the year 74 fall the sixth issue of Vespasian, with COS. V on reverse, and the fourth of Titus, with COS. IIII. To this year and the next belongs the second issue of Domitian, with COS. III on obverse:² note the varying direction of the reverse legends which read inwardly and outwardly by turns. Small groups of undated coins of Vespasian and Titus may be assigned to this year on account of the obverse legends (note particularly the abbreviated VESP.), the reverse types, and the direction in which the legends read. The denarius, with obverse, Vespasian in triumphal quadriga, reverse, Victory on prow, is a definite 'triumph' type and, as such, might be attributed to late A.D. 71 or early 72. It is, however, directly copied from one of Augustus's Eastern issues,³ and, as the copying of other Augustan reverses only begins in A.D. 74, should perhaps be assigned rather to that year; the form of legend (IMP. CAESAR VESP. AVG.) is in favour of this date.

To the year 75 belong the seventh issue of Vespasian (COS. VI) and the fifth of Titus (COS. IIII). To the same year we assign, on the ground of the reverse types, the coins of Vespasian and Titus, dated IMP. XIII and IMP. VIII respectively. The second issue of Domitian (COS. III) runs on into this year.

The eighth issue of Vespasian (COS. VII) and the sixth of Titus (COS. V) are of the year 76. The evidence of the Eastern 'O' mint proves that Domitian's third issue (COS. IIII) is not earlier than this year.⁴

The years 77-78 include the ninth issue of Vespasian (COS. VIIII), the seventh of Titus (COS. VI) and the fourth of Domitian (COS. V). The victory that won for Vespasian the title IMP. XIX and for Titus that of IMP. XIII is usually taken to be that won by Agricola over the Ordovices in the summer of 78.

² Domitian probably entered on his third consulship in March 73.

³ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 101, Nos. 616 ff.

⁴ At that mint we find Domitian (COS. III, IIII) beside Vespasian (COS. VII) and Titus (COS. V). Domitian was still COS. III in January and February 76, COS. IIII from March onwards.

Finally the year 79 embraces the tenth issue of Vespasian (TR. P. X COS. VIII), the eighth of Titus (TR. P. VIII COS. VII), and the fifth of Domitian (COS. VI)—the last-named running on after the death of Vespasian, 23 June, to the end of the year.

Of the undated coins, which, from form and direction of legends, can be fixed to the period A.D. 75-79, several (such as 'Aeternitas', 'Fortuna Augusta', 'Iovis Custos', 'Pax August.') can be marked down as early, 75-76, one or two others, such as 'Annona Aug.', 'Ceres August.', as late—c. 78.¹ The quinarii with Victory types can only be placed approximately by their portraits. The issue in which Vespasian and Titus both omit the title IMP. on obverse includes the reverses dated IMP. XIX, IMP. XIII, and is probably to be dated to the summer or autumn of 78.

Aes. After a scanty coinage in A.D. 70 (COS. II) the mint began striking in earnest for Vespasian with a great issue in which we can distinguish two parts, one with the form VESPASIAN. in the title, the second and later with VESPAS.

The famous sestertius with standing figures of Titus and Domitian on the reverse and the legend, CAES. AVG. F. DES. IMP. AVG. F. COS. DES. IT., was struck between March and June of this year. The figure on the left is Titus, described by legend on left as 'Caesar son of Augustus emperor designate';² the date, then, is before 1 July, when Titus was raised to the empire as his father's colleague. The figure on the right is Domitian, described as 'Caesar (understood) son of Augustus designate consul for the second time'; as Domitian was probably consul for the first time from March to June, the coin was struck within that period. Pick,³ taking the figure on the right to be Titus, has read the legend as 'Imperator Augusti filius consul designatus iterum (i.e. Titus) Caesar Augusti filius [consul] designatus' (i.e. Domitian), and has dated accordingly to January and February 71. But this ingenious view cannot be accepted, for (1) it involves reading the legend from an unusual starting-point (high r.); (2) the figure on the right is Domitian and the legend on right should apply to him; (3) it is hardly credible that COS. has been omitted before DES.⁴ There is no difficulty in supplying a second 'Caesar' before the second 'Aug. f.' or, probably better, in reading 'Caesares' at the beginning and applying it to both the princes, whose distinctive titles are then subjoined. The one real difficulty is that Domitian was not actually COS. II till 73, and that we are forced to suppose that his second consulship was postponed from 72 to 73. This, however, is the easiest explanation available.

³ Z. f. N., 1885, pp. 190 ff.

⁴ For further discussion see below on types. For similar reasons, the reading 'Caesar Aug. f. Des. Imp. (i.e. Domitian) [Imp] Aug. f. Cos. Des. It. (i.e. Titus)' must be rejected.

The issue of Vespasian with COS. IIII fills 72 and runs over into the early months of 73; it is followed by the issue with COS. IIII CENS.. Titus strikes his first aes in Rome from January to July 72, as TR. P. COS. II; after 1 July he gives his second tribunician year and adds his third acclamation as imperator (IMP. III)—acquired for an Eastern victory of Caesennius Paetus in the summer. The fourth acclamation (IMP. IIII) probably followed in the same year. A short issue of Titus, with TR. P. III COS. II, seems to precede his issue with COS. II CENS.: as he was not TR. P. III before 1 July 73, the date of April 73, sometimes given for the censorship of Vespasian and Titus, is evidently too early. Domitian strikes in A.D. 72 as COS. DES. II,¹ in A.D. 73 as COS. III.

For the remainder of the reign the issues follow the same general lines as those of gold and silver. The coinage of A.D. 74–75 is light, that of 79 very light.

Types and Legends. A, R.

Obverse. The title of Vespasian, though familiar enough in form from its later parallels, was something of an innovation at the time. Vespasian naturally adopted the distinctive imperial title of 'Augustus', and, in taking the praenomen of 'imperator', he could quote the precedent of Augustus, Nero, Galba, and Otho. What was more remarkable was that he took over from the Julio-Claudian dynasty the family name of 'Caesar' and, combining it with 'Imp.', used the form 'Imp. Caesar' as a sort of imperial praenomen in place of his own praenomen of 'Titus'. His gentile name, Flavius, never appears. The omission of the praenomen 'Imp.' on an issue of 78, though no doubt connected with the use of the reverse legend, IMP. XIX, may have some minor political significance, throwing the stress on the civil, as opposed to the military side, of the Emperor's position. The consulship is often referred to, usually on the reverse, the censorship on issues of A.D. 73 only. The tribunician power is usually given only as a general title; only in the last year is the number (X) added as a date. The imperator title with numbers occurs twice, IMP. XIII and IMP. XIX. The office of 'pontifex maximus' is mentioned in the obverse legend of A.D. 71–73, in the reverse A.D. 73–76. The title of 'Pater patriae' conferred in 70, is never included. Vespasian normally wears the laurel-wreath of the victorious Roman Emperor; the bare head, which occurs on one or two late coins, may, like the omission of the praenomen 'Imp.', suggest the civil basis of the Emperor's power. The head is at first always to the right; portraits to the left occur sporadically in the later years.

Titus, who from 1 July 71 was his father's colleague in the Empire, uses his titles in much the same way, except that for 'pontif. maxim.'

he can only appear as 'pontif.'. Like his father, he adopts the family name 'Caesar' from the Julio-Claudian line. The main military command, however, which is expressed by the 'praenomen' of 'imperator', could not be shared; the colleague could only be 'imperator' in a subordinate degree. A difference in titulature was devised to express this difference in competence; Titus is not 'Imp. T. Caesar' but 'T. Caesar Imp. Vespasianus'—the title of 'imperator' is incorporated in his name as a constituent part, but not as a praenomen.¹ Of any difference of opinion between father and son on this matter of precedence the coins show no trace.² On the issue of 78, on which Vespasian omits his praenomen of 'imperator', Titus too omits the 'imperator' from his name. He invariably wears the laurel-wreath, and on most, if not all well-preserved coins, is shown with a slight beard. The description which we have given in the text, 'head of Titus, laureate, bearded', tends to mislead and is to be interpreted in the light of this comment. His head is always to the right.

Domitian, like his brother, always wears the laurel-wreath and has a slight beard.³ Though excluded from any share in the imperial power, he ranked as heir apparent and, as such, uses the name 'Caesar' as a distinctive praenomen, corresponding to the praenomen 'imperator' of Vespasian. Gaius and Lucius Caesar had borne the name as part of their family inheritance. Germanicus and Drusus, Nero and the younger Drusus, sons of Germanicus, Nero himself, had all borne the title as a family cognomen, carrying some suggestion of their rank as princes. With Domitian, who of course had no family claim to it, this technical meaning becomes established. Domitian alludes freely to his consulship—the one office in which he was allowed a considerable share, albeit, mostly, only as 'consul suffectus'.

Reverse. A.D. 69–70.

Vespasian from the first left no doubt about his intention of founding a dynasty.⁴ The busts of his sons, Titus and Domitian, appear facing one another on the reverse,⁵ with a legend describing each of them as 'Caesar

² But, for a contrary view, see Chambalu in Philologus, 1885, pp. 106 ff. Cp. Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, vi. 30; Suetonius, Divus Titus, 5. Titus had been suspected of plotting against his father in the East: 'quare festinans in Italiam, cum Regium, dein Puteolos oneraria nave appulisset, Romam inde contendit expeditissimus inopinantique patri, velut arguens rumorum de se temeritatem, "Veni, inquit, pater, veni."' Augusti filius' and mentioning the offices assigned to them in 71, the consulship to Titus, the praetorship to Domitian. On other coins both bear the title of 'princeps iuventutis' and are represented characteristically as armed warriors on horseback¹ or as magistrates seated on curule chairs, holding the branch of peace. A rare aureus, perhaps from a foreign mint, shows them standing, holding rolls as symbols of public life in Rome, paterae as symbols of priesthood.² The title of 'princeps iuventutis' had already come to be a normal designation of the heir apparent.³

It was as commander of the Roman legions against rebel Judaea that Vespasian had first drawn men's eyes to him and been singled out as a candidate for Empire. In spite of the delays imposed by the changes of power at Rome, the back of the war was broken,⁴ and 'Judaea capta', the conquered province, could be displayed on the coins—perhaps not till after the capture of Jerusalem, 7–8 September 70. Judaea is represented by a Jewess, seated, either bound to a palm-tree, the emblem of the land, or before a trophy of captive arms. The veil over her head, the head sunk over her hand, her whole posture express utter dejection. The type, developed naturally from the obvious type of captive and trophy,⁵ is noteworthy as the first of a long series of types of beaten foes; it is in marked contrast to the 'loyal province' types of Hadrian.

Similarly inspired is the type of Mars advancing r., holding spear and legionary eagle, a 'Mars Ultor', reminding us of the type of the Civil Wars.⁶ The thought of the absent Emperor and the hope of his return⁷ are embodied in the types of Neptune and Fortuna. Fortuna redux, the bringer-home, has a prow, to suggest the sea-voyage, in place of the more normal rudder, which she holds as 'Fortuna gubernans'.

Next is struck a note which echoes throughout the reign—the note of peace, so earnestly desired after the misery of the Civil Wars.⁸ Pax appears either seated or standing, with her own attribute, the olive-branch, and the caduceus, borrowed from a companion deity, Felicitas. Securitas—if indeed her type is correctly reported in this year—accords well with Pax; her chief characteristic is the head propped on her hand, not in dejection, like captive Judaea, but at ease. Aequitas, with scales and sceptre (or, perhaps, pertica—measuring-rod), appears more commonly on the aes of the reign.¹ She denotes the just spirit that prompts the Emperor to give fair weight and measure, with particular reference to the distributions of corn to the poor of Rome.

The imperial title, Cos. iter. tr. pot., often takes the place of a descriptive reverse legend: a rare variant, tr. potestate,² shows that tr. pot. is normally to be taken as a descriptive ablative. The mint seems to have made a practice of giving the imperial titles on at least a portion of each issue, probably in order to ensure that they should be widely known.

The very rare denarius,³ with obverse, bust of Sol, reverse, Vespasian standing, is in a class by itself. The obverse is copied directly from the denarius of L. Mussidius Longus, with reverse, Cloacin., two figures standing on a platform, struck in 42 B.C., probably just after the battle of Philippi.⁴ The reverse, Vespasian as general addressing his troops, recalls a similar type on a denarius of Augustus, struck in the East after Actium.⁵ The legend, Vespasianvs, defines the person of the general, but omits any reference to the fact that he is Emperor. We are reminded of Helvidius Priscus 'qui ... reversum ... ex Syria solus privato nomine Vespasianum salutaverat',⁶ for this is precisely what the coin does. It is to the activities of this man or his friends then that we must ascribe this coin, whether struck at the imperial mint or not. The analogy of Philippi was, indeed, not altogether a happy one for Republicans; but the coin of Mussidius Longus, we must remember, does not exult over the victory, but preaches reconciliation. The reference to Augustus might suggest to Vespasian that he too should restore the state to the power of the senate and people of Rome. But, when we ask exactly how Republicans conceived of a restoration of the Republic, we may well be puzzled. In any case the issue was an isolated one and was not repeated.

A.D. 70-71.

In November 70, Vespasian, now 'pontifex maximus' added the letters P. M. to his title. The types of the issue are closely connected with religion. The simpulum, sprinkler and jug are emblems of the pontificate, the lituus of the augurate. The legends mention the augurate and either the chief pontificate or the tribunician power; the parallelism between the two latter is noticeable.¹ The two types of Vesta further represent the religious functions of the Emperor, who, as 'pontifex maximus', stood in the closest relation to the worship of that goddess.²

There are again types of Mars and Pax and a new type of Neptune, identified as 'Redux', the 'home-bringer'³; the reference is to the return of Titus to Rome in June 71. The Victory on a globe suggests the world-wide range of Vespasian's triumphs.⁴

A. D. 72-73.

The types are, in part, a continuation of those of the previous issue. Of the new types, the Concordia Augusti celebrates the share in the government given to Titus, who received the tribunician power on 1 July 71. The Victory in act to crown a trophy is a neat expression of 'Victory crowning the successful arms of Rome'. Finally, the triumph of Vespasian and Titus, celebrated in June 71,⁵ is here recorded some six months or more after the event. Both Vespasian and Titus appear as 'triumphator' in triumphal quadriga, holding the laurel-branch and the ivory sceptre, with an eagle at the tip. A new variety of the Iudaea capta type, in which a victorious prince stands behind the Jewess and palm-tree, defines the occasion of the triumph. Titus, who seems not to strike before 72, draws on the same stock of types as his father. His issues, which are mainly in gold, bear a specially triumphal character. Of the closing of the temple of Janus there is no record on coins; Vespasian may have been averse to echoing a type of Nero.

A. D. 73.

One of the new types of this year seems to have a definite connexion with the imperial censorship. Fides Publica is the deity who presides over that good faith on which the Roman particularly prided himself.

² B. M. C., Emp., i, p. cxxxi and n. Add Ovid, Fasti iii, 697 ff. Vesta, like many other deities, holds an attribute really more appropriate to the priest—in this case, the simpulum.

³ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 100, No. 615: the globe under his foot marks him as a ruler of the world.

⁵ Cp. Josephus, Bell. Iud. vii. 123 ff.

She appears frequently on Roman coins from Domitian onwards,¹ with ears of corn and a basket of fruit as attributes. Here, the sphere of her activities is defined by the clasped hands for concord, the caduceus for commercial prosperity, and the poppy and corn-ears for agriculture. The 'national credit' is a close concern of the censor, and it can hardly be accident that Domitian as 'censor perpetuus' should repeat the type year by year on his aes. Salus Aug. should refer to the personal safety of the Emperor²—we hear that throughout his reign he was exposed to plots. The character of Pax Augusta is expressed by a composite type, in which Pax carries not only her own olive-branch, but also the caduceus of Felicitas and the foliis (purse) of Mercury, the god who gives commercial success, and leans on the column of Securitas.³ The great temple of Peace, which became something like an art-gallery for Rome,⁴ was building in the years A.D. 71–75, but is not itself represented on the coins. The exact occasion of the offering of an oak-wreath to Vespasian and Titus by the 'senate and people of Rome' (S. P. Q. R.) is not exactly defined, but we naturally think of the 'Vota quinquennalia', which would be paid in this year.⁵ As in the reign of Nero, the appearance of the temple of Vesta on coins must be connected with some ceremony of propitiation in view of the great fire.⁶ The differences in the representation of the temple are more apparent than real. In both cases there is a round dome (tholos), with an aperture at the top, and a podium of four steps. Vespasian's coin shows only four columns of the peristyle as against six on Nero's. The statue between the columns is seated on Nero's coin, standing on Vespasian's; but, in any case, the placing of a statue in that position is probably only an artistic convention—in the interior, where statues of the goddess really belonged, there may have been statues of both types. The statues to left and right of the temple may be permanent features, which were simply omitted by Nero's die-sinkers; it is possible that they were added by Vespasian. The identity of these statues is doubtful; on some coins we seem to see Jupiter holding a sceptre and patera on the right, Mercury holding a purse and caduceus on the left.⁷ The silver quinarius keeps the Victory type, to which it owes its name of victoriatas.

² If there were any reference to the 'augurium salutis' we should expect to read Salus P. R. The type is the same as that of Nero, cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 212, Nos. 87 ff.

⁵ The restoration of Achaëa to the senate might also be in view. The palm on which the wreath seems at times to rest would suggest Judaea.

Later in the year Vespasian strikes a Pontif. Maxim. reverse, in direct imitation of the famous type of Tiberius.¹ The figure on reverse, however, is here male, not female, and represents the Emperor himself as peace-bringer. Titus strikes a similar type, sometimes with his own legend Pontif. in place of his father's Pontif. Maxim. With the same legend Vespasian restores the Paci Augustae type of Claudius, a winged Nemesis with caduceus and snake.² The 'imperial Peace' has respect for Nemesis, who punishes crime and at the same time warns the victor himself against the 'ὑβρις' which he punishes. The denarius, with legend T. Caesar, and Titus in a triumphal quadriga, may be regarded as an interesting collegiate type—if indeed the coin is genuine. The coins of Titus have the same selection of reverses as his father's.

Domitian, beside one or two types of his father, has one personal type that shows him riding on horseback, carrying a sceptre with a human head at tip;—perhaps the moment chosen for portrayal is that of his riding on horseback at his father's triumph in 71.³

A.D. 74.

The winged caduceus, the symbol of commercial prosperity,⁴ is probably to be associated with the censorship. The statue of Fortune on a low base shows her with her favourite attributes, the rudder with which she steers the world, the cornucopiae from which she dispenses plenty.⁵ Fortuna was one of the deities who, under the Early Empire, enjoyed a heart-felt worship. A world that was often in doubt of the divine providence felt the need to propitiate the power that could bring about those amazing vicissitudes of fate which were characteristic of the time. The philosopher saw in her the great antagonist of the true sage, the man of the world a capricious power, whose favour was only too well worth seeking, however little it depended on merit.⁶ And where was Fortuna's power more strikingly displayed than in the elevation of the Sabine countryman, Vespasian, to the highest pinnacle of human fame?¹ The 'Fortuna Augusta', the special Fortuna that watched over the imperial office, was symbolized in the second century, if not earlier, by a golden statuette, which, as a mark of Empire, was regularly kept in the Emperor's bedchamber.²

The heifer is unquestionably the famous statue of Myron which had been placed by Augustus in the 'Porticus Apollinis'³ and was transferred by Vespasian to the temple of Peace.

We have already noted the restoration of several famous types of the early Empire. To these we may now add the two laurel-trees, probably, for Vespasian as for Augustus, planted in front of his door, and the Victory on prow—triumphal quadriga, if indeed it is rightly attributed to this year.⁴ In A.D. 70 had ended the first hundred years of the Empire as reckoned from Actium, 31 B.C.; if we reckon from 27 B.C. when Augustus first took his distinctive title we actually reach this year, 74.⁵ It was probably this occasion that suggested the restoration of earlier types, reinforced by the desire to associate the new imperial house with the fame of its predecessor⁶ and to keep in public memory types that were gradually becoming obsolete, as the old coins wore out and were withdrawn from circulation.

Titus follows in the track of his father. Domitian has one definite 'heir apparent' type with the legend princeps iuventutis and a figure of Spes on the reverse.⁷

Commemorative types are again to the fore. The butting bull is borrowed from the coinage of Augustus at Lugdunum,¹ the Victory on prow from the Eastern quinarius of Augustus,² the Victory on cista between snakes from another Eastern quinarius of Augustus with legend Asia Recepta.³ There is certainly method in the choice of types for restoration. The butting bull on coins of Augustus had been closely associated, as it is here, with 'imperator' legends (Imp. X, Imp. XII) and had definite Gallic associations.⁴ The Victory on prow is the 'Victoria Navalis', so freely commemorated on the aes; Laffranchi is probably wrong in referring it directly to Actium, though a parallel no doubt is drawn. The Victory on the cista mystica has an obvious reference to Asia Minor, the land of the 'cistophori'.⁵ It is not unlikely that after the closing of the local mints in Gaul and Asia, types bearing special reference to those provinces were chosen out for the Roman coinage—perhaps for special circulation there. Titus copies the capricorn from the coinage of Augustus. It was the natal sign of Augustus: was it perhaps also that of Titus?⁶ The Securitas type of Vespasian suggests the lifting of a threatening danger by the execution of Helvidius Priscus.⁷

The undated Iovis Custos no doubt refers, like the Iuppiter Custos of Nero, to the failure of plots against the Emperor's safety.⁸ The variation of legend, produced by the old nominative Iovis, was probably deliberately made in order to avoid too direct an echo of the Neronian type. The god is represented, in a sense, as his own worshipper, sacrificing at an altar. The seated Pax type reminds us of the completion of the temple of the goddess in this year.⁹

A.D. 76.

The type of the heifer of Myron, already discussed above, is really distinctive of this year. The chief new types are the eagle on base and the Aeternitas, represented by a figure holding heads of Sun and Moon. There is an unmistakable reference to the death of the Emperor-maker, Mucianus. The symbolism of Aeternitas is natural—'as long as sun and moon endure'. The immortality of the blessed dead was conceived of in the fashion of the later Stoics, as set among the stars in the upper air.¹ The eagle too was a symbol of after-life.² Titus again uses the same reverses as his father.

Domitian has two new types, both copied from earlier coinages, the cornucopiae from the aureus of L. Mussidius Longus,³ the Pegasus from the denarius of P. Petronius Turpilianus.⁴ The cornucopiae, apart from a possible special reference, is a general symbol of prosperity. The Pegasus of Turpilianus seems to have referred to the poetic inspiration of his ancestor, Sextus Turpilius—not without a side-glance at the death of the great poet-laureate, Virgil. Here it may convey a compliment to Domitian, who 'simulavit et ipse mire modestiam in primisque poeticae studium, tam insuetum antea sibi quam postea spretum et abiectum, recitavitque etiam publice.'⁵

A.D. 77-78.

The victory commemorated by the Victory crowning Emperor—a type that was to become a commonplace of imperial symbolism—was probably that won by Trajan the Elder, father of the later Emperor, in Syria.⁶ The Mars with spear and trophy (a 'Mars triumphant' type) is borrowed from the denarius of L. Valerius Flaccus, struck c. 108 B.C.⁷ Is the corn-ear in the field meant to suggest that triumph brings with it peace and prosperity on the land, or is it conceivably a reminder of the original character of Mars, as a god of the fields, invoked as such by the Arval Brethren in their famous hymn? The star above prow, borrowed from the coinage of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, struck for Mark Antony c. 40 B.C., is a type of the successful admiral, here applied to Vespasian.⁸ The yoke of oxen has been thought to represent the 'colonist' type, referring to an extension of the pomoerium, but it can hardly be separated from the other agricultural types to be discussed below.⁹ Titus revives the type of an interesting anonymous denarius of about 105 B.C., Roma Reitzenstein's illustrations are most valuable: he seems, however, to assume too readily that the 'Eternity of Rome' was an earlier conception than the 'Eternity of the Emperor' and that, on coins, the two are inextricably entangled.

seated, resting after warfare, while beside her is the famous she-wolf of legend; the general thought is that of 'Roma Renascens'.¹ The trophy and captive of Titus is perhaps a reference back to his Jewish triumph.

The Caesar Vespasianus Aug. issue is taken up with types drawn from country life, Annona with a bundle of corn-ears on her lap, the modius and corn-ears, the sow and young, the goat-herd milking a she-goat. The undated Ceres August., Ceres holding corn-ears, poppy and torch, must be of about the same date. We seem to see here the outline of a programme for the restoration of agricultural prosperity in Italy, of which our scanty authorities have left no detailed record. The war-god Mars has given the victory which enables the arts of peace to flourish. Rome is reborn, in the sense of a revival of her country-districts—agriculture, dairy-farming and stock-breeding—under the favour of the corn-goddess Ceres and her attendant spirit, Annona. We shall see later under Domitian some traces of a policy designed to make Italy to some extent self-supporting.² Titus again follows closely in his father's track.

The she-wolf and twins of Domitian echoes the 'Roma Renascens' type of Titus.³ The kneeling man offering a standard is a Parthian, borrowed from the famous type of Augustus of a Parthian restoring the standards.⁴ A definite topical reference is implied. The Parthians had again been suing at Rome—not for peace, but for military help against the Alani—and Domitian had moved heaven and earth to secure the command for himself.⁵ Hence this apt suggestion of Parthian embassies to Rome. The helmeted horseman is Mars, calling Rome to take the field for this distant expedition.

A.D. 79.

The type of Victory crowning the Emperor is again struck and, with the new type of Victory crowning a trophy, records a victory of Agricola in Britain: to the same context perhaps belongs the type of Titus with trophy and captive.⁶ The agricultural programme of 78 is further developed by a new type of Ceres seated and by a type of Italia (?) with crown of towers, standing, holding sceptre and corn-ears: the crown of towers represents the famous cities of Italy, the sceptre her dignity, the basket of fruits her country wealth.¹ Other types are rooted in the past. The capricorn and globe suggest Augustus.² The radiate figure on a rostral column, which recalls the Eastern issue of Augustus, is the colossus, with the features of Nero or of Titus, set up in 75.³ The Venus Victrix, the goddess successful in love and in war, has borrowed the spear and helmet of her lover Mars. As the ancestress of the Julian house, she had figured largely in the coinage of Julius Caesar and Augustus,⁴ and Titus, by adopting this type, claims to enter into the traditions of the old imperial line. The quadriga with the basket of corn-ears shows the procession of the calathus of Ceres, sung by Callimachus in his hymn:⁵ it had already appeared on coins of the moneyers of Augustus in 17 B.C.⁶ It is unmistakably derived from Alexandria, and suggests the importance of Egypt as the granary of Rome, even beside any endeavours of the Emperor to revive Italian agriculture.

The coinage of Domitian is remarkable for the new and original turn that it now takes. The legend Princeps iuventutis appears throughout, but the types are in several cases better suited to an Emperor than to a prince. The goat in the wreath is the goat Amalthea, the foster-nurse of the infant Jupiter—one type of the Emperor to be.⁷ The type of Salus might refer to the failing health of Vespasian, or again might suggest the 'Salus Populi Romani'. Vesta with her palladium is typical of the religion of eternal Rome.⁸ The clasped hands, holding eagle set on prow, represent 'Concordia Militum'—the 'Harmony of the troops'—fleet as well as army.⁹ This last type at least was certainly struck after the death of Vespasian: it confirms and is confirmed by the authority of Suetonius, who tells us how Domitian 'patre defuncto, diu cunctatus an duplum donativum militi offerret, numquam iactare dubitavit relictum se participem imperii, sed fraudem testamento adhibitam.'¹

The study of the hybrid denarii of the reign, which are very numerous, is important, not so much for its own sake (the combination of obverses and reverses being due rather to chance than to design), as for the elimination of errors from the general picture of the coinage. Until we can separate these unofficial forgeries from the official coins, we are liable to serious mistakes of dating and misinterpretations of types, based on these false dates.²

A few general principles govern the gold and silver coinage of the reign. The intention of Vespasian to found a dynasty is most clearly marked by the share given to his two sons in the coinage; but there is no trace of any intention on his part to place Domitian on a level with Titus. The founder of the new dynasty is much concerned to establish connexions with the old Republic and the first imperial house. Restored types are a persistent feature of the reign. A second purpose served by such types would be the saving from oblivion of obsolescent coins. The very rare series of denarii, bearing a countermark of Vespasian,³ perhaps preserves the memory of an abortive attempt to pass the whole of the earlier silver coinage under review and save a certain proportion of it from destruction. The selection of types to be restored was so made as to throw light on current events of the day. And, finally, there is a strong propagandist element in the coinage, stressing the merits of the Emperor in restoring the 'Pax Augusta' and commending his endeavour to restore the prosperity of Rome and Italy.

Obverse.

Vespasian and Titus invariably wear the laurel-wreath on the sester-tius and as, the radiate crown on the dupondius: the quadrans is given up to such types as caduceus, standard, or palm-tree, without head of Emperor. Domitian never has the radiate crown and sometimes has head bare. His dupondii can only be distinguished from the asses by weight and colour. The titles of Vespasian are similar to those used on his gold and silver. They are normally confined to the obverse and include the titles of pontifex maximus and pater patriae and refer to the tribunician power and the appropriate consulship. The censorship finds mention on coins of A.D. 73-74. The difficulty about the imperator title of Titus was settled here by treating it definitely as a cognomen and placing it after, instead of before, the name Vespasianus. On some issues of 72-73 Titus records his third and fourth acclamation as imperator. The occasional omission of the imperator title on issues of A.D. 77-78 seems to correspond to the omission on gold and silver.¹

Reverses.

A.D. 69-70. The scanty coinage of this period includes types of Roma (Victrix), of Spes, of Victory, and of Aequitas.² Tutela, 'guardianship', is represented by a woman with two children before her: Cohen can hardly be right in identifying the woman with Domitilla, but the children seem to stand for Titus and Domitian, and Tutela is the guardian care of the Emperor that watches over his sons.³

A.D. 71. In this year the Senatorial mint of Rome resumed its full working and, with the mints of Tarraco and Lugdunum, issued a great coinage, expressly designed to announce the foundation of the new dynasty, the recovery of Rome from the shock of civil and foreign war, and the inauguration of a new political programme.

In the first place we have the coin showing the new Emperor, with full imperial title, and on reverse, Titus 'Caesar Augusti filius designatus imperator' and Domitian 'Augusti filius consul designatus iterum'. The interpretation of the type has been discussed already,⁴ when its date was fixed as March-June, 71. Close examination of the coins leads to the conclusion that the figure on the left must be Titus, the figure on the right Domitian.⁵ If this is so, the legend on the left must be applied to Titus and interpreted as above, and all explanations based on the contrary assumption must be rejected. The type is undoubtedly friendly to Domitian and minimizes the gap between him and his brother. Domitian's second consulship in prospect⁶ is set off against his brother's designation as 'imperator', and Domitian, as princeps iuventutis, actually bears the sospite quo gratum credimus esse Iovem'.

³ Or the children might represent citizens and Tutela would then be the Emperor's ward over his subjects. Cp. Suetonius, Divus Vespasianus, 5, an omen that portended 'desertam rem p. civili aliqua perturbatione in tutelam eius ac velut in gremium devenituram.' For the same type, doubtfully quoted among the reverses of Vitellius, see B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 383. For the wider meaning of 'tutela', cp. Pliny, Panegyric, 68. 5, 6, Ep. x. 52 and 102. C. I. L. ii. 3349, which is probably of this period, shows a dedication to 'Augusto, Paci perpetuae et Concordiae Augustae', by 'Q. Vibius Felicio sevir et Vibia Felicula, ministra Tutelae Augustae.' Martial (v. 1. 7 ff.) addresses Domitian as

'o rerum felix tutela salusque

⁵ This is confirmed by the Lugdunum coin described below in text, p. 196, no. 798: there it is at least certain that Domitian is on the left.

spear and parazonium¹ while Titus holds only the spear—or, in its place, at times the sceptre. It is possible that there is some trace of distrust of the old Emperor for his elder son, who was said to be taking too much upon him in the East.² Concordia Aug. stands for harmony in the imperial house: she holds her usual attribute, the patera of sacrifice, and there is sometimes an altar in field. The Spes Augusta type shows the goddess, Spes, greeting three helmeted men, who can be none other than Vespasian and his sons; the type is a definite proclamation of the new dynasty, resting not only on the warrior-emperor, but on the two full-grown sons, who had both been fighting Rome's battles.³ Fortuna Redux is the Fortuna who brings Titus home in June 71; the branch which she holds, beside her own rudder and cornucopiae, is either the olive-branch of Pax or the laurel of the home-returning conqueror.

In the second place follows the commemoration of the triumphant end of the great wars. The great personal achievement of Vespasian and Titus, the repression of the revolt of the Jews, is richly illustrated by Iudaea Capta types; the nation is represented by male and female captives, the land by its palm-tree, while scattered arms betray defeat. The types in which the victorious Vespasian stands armed behind the palm is perhaps particularly designed to suggest the coming triumph and goes with the type of Vespasian as triumphator in his quadriga.⁴

Clasped hands holding caduceus and palms suggest the 'loyalty that has brought success in the Jewish war'; clasped hands, holding legionary eagle on prow, the 'Loyalty of the Army and Navy'. Further honour is paid to the troops in the types of legionary eagle and standards⁵ and of Honos and Virtus, the two great military 'Virtues'. Virtus appears as usual as an Amazon and sets her foot on the boar's-head, the symbol of conquered Gaul: Honos, who represents the more peaceful side of the soldier's life, has the cornucopiae for prosperity and the sceptre for dignity.⁶ The gods of war have their share in the celebrations. Mars is shown as 'Victor' standing with spear and trophy, or hastening with Victory and trophy to the left.⁷ A similar type, with the bare legend S.C., Mars advancing right, holding spear and trophy, was perhaps traditionally regarded as 'Mars Pater'—the ancestor of the Roman nation.¹ Minerva Victrix is accompanied by a snake—which suggests a thought of Nemesis, who has overtaken the offenders against the majesty of Rome.²

A number of Roma types announce the triumph and revival of the sovereign city.—Roma victorious, with spear and Victory, Roma valorous, with spear and parazonium—the foot set on a prow suggests victory at sea.³ Roma resurgens is personified as a woman, kneeling to be raised up by the Emperor: the goddess Roma, here clearly distinguished from the earthly city, is in attendance on the scene.⁴ The wreath which Roma holds on the dupondius is the sign of Victory, or, perhaps rather of rejoicing for it. The return of the standards (Signis Receptis S. C.) is not certainly commemorated on coins of Rome.⁵

After war comes the turn of peace. Pax is represented with her normal attributes, olive-branch and cornucopiae,⁶ with her branch and the caduceus of Felicitas, offering thanksgiving sacrifice over an altar, and also with the torch with which she sets fire to a pile of conquered arms. There is, unfortunately, as Dr. Regling has pointed out,⁷ no question of 'beating swords into plough-shares'. It is the arms taken from the defeated enemy that are now burnt, in pursuance of a vow, to Mars, Minerva, and the other gods of war: Minerva herself is sometimes represented watching the scene.⁸ The legend that is sometimes found, Pax P(opuli) R(omani), marks the peace as welcomed and endorsed by the people of Rome—a suggestion of deference on the part of the Emperor to his subjects, of proud assertion of Rome against her rebellious subjects. There is probably a hint of the closing of the temple of Janus.⁹ Pax Augusti, it must be insisted, is not simply a state of peace, the 'Pax

Augusta'; Pax is here a Virtue of the Emperor—that special phase of the goddess, through which the Emperor can become 'pacifer'.¹ To crown this work of peace-making Vespasian set in hand the building of the great Temple of Peace in this year. Then follow the inevitable Victory types—Victory setting up a shield announcing the 'saving of the citizens', Victory setting up a trophy over a prostrate Jew, Victory presenting to Vespasian the palladium, the symbol of eternal Rome, Victory crowning Vespasian, as he sacrifices in front of an arch. If Mr. F. A. Walters is right in his suggestion that the arch is the same as that figured on a posthumous sestertius of Galba himself, Vespasian is offering an atoning sacrifice to the spirit of his murdered predecessor.² Victoria Navalis on her prow demands a word of explanation. Laffranchi has suggested a definite commemoration of Actium, and he is probably right in so far as a parallel is drawn between Augustus and Vespasian, both victorious in the East. But there had been little naval fighting in the Jewish war, and the Civil War, to which veiled reference might be made, had been won on land, against the advice, or even the orders of the Emperor. The official policy of Vespasian had been that of a slow but certain victory by blockade of Rome from Egypt; and it is to call attention to the wisdom and importance of this policy that the coins were designed.³ 'Victory at Sea', be it noted, is a quite inadequate rendering of 'Victoria Navalis'—'Our Lady Victory of the Fleet' will give more of the original colour.⁴

Finally comes a series of types announcing the policy and tendencies of the new reign. We have already seen that Vespasian claims the credit of having restored peace by his victorious arms. His next claim is to be a constitutional Emperor—standing in the succession of Galba, not of Otho⁵ and Vitellius. This is the meaning of the reverse Libertas Restituta S. C., Vespasian raising Libertas to her feet, of the oak-wreaths offered to Vespasian by senate and people of Rome as 'Saviour of his Country' (ob cives servatos)⁶ and as 'Assertor of the national liberty'

Vespasian gained a victory over the Jews on the Lake of Gennesaret.

(adsertori libertatis publicae),¹ of the types of Libertas herself, Libertas Augusti with wreath and sceptre, and Libertas Publica with pileus in place of wreath.² Libertas Augusti, a rare form, is a virtue of the Emperor, his constitutional spirit; her wreath is a symbol of rejoicing. Especially agreeable to the senate was the respect shown by Vespasian to the memory of Galba. The type of the victorious Vespasian crowned by the senate, with legend Concordia Senatui, must be taken in close connexion with the similar posthumous type of Galba, with legend Senatus Pietati Augusti.³ The second legend is easily understood—the Senate honours Vespasian for his piety towards his predecessor. The Concordia Senatui is harder to explain, for Senatui can hardly be a genitive—‘The Harmony of the Senate (with the Emperor).’ Read as a dative, it requires some such meaning as this—‘Concordia (persuades) the Senate to crown Vespasian’. The murder of Galba, the lawful Emperor, by mutineers in Rome had been a terrible blow to the constitution, and Vespasian showed great wisdom in doing what lay in his power to wipe out the disgrace. Salus Augusta may be compared with Pax Augusta and interpreted as the salvation conferred by the imperial system, Securitas P. Romani is the happy result of the Pax P. Romani, Securitas Augusti the secure estate of the Emperor himself; the head propped on the hand suggests untroubled rest, the altar sacrifices of thanksgiving.⁴ Felicitas Publica is the national prosperity that follows in the wake of peace.⁵ Of Tutela we have already spoken.⁶ The safety of the corn-supply is attested by the type of Ceres Augusta; it had been seriously jeopardized under Vitellius by Vespasian’s seizure of Egypt, but was now assured again by his victory.⁷ Aequitas Augusti testifies to the Emperor’s concern for the right weight and measure of the corn: the

² For type, cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 312, No. 24, &c. The normal attributes of Libertas are the pileus, the round cap worn by the freed slave, and the sceptre, or rather the wand (vindicta), by a touch of which the praetor conferred freedom.

³ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, pp. ccxvii, 359, No. 260 a: cp. also the posthumous type of Galba, Pietas Augusti, ibid., p. 358. For the personification of the senate, cp. Perhaps ‘Concordia’ here denotes Vespasian himself and the two legends are parallel—the senate honours the piety of Augustus, the Emperor, as symbol of Concord, honours the senate: for this use of Concordia, cp. Suetonius, Vitellius, 15.

⁴ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 241, No. 212, &c., p. 299, No. 37, &c. For various shades of meaning, cp. Pliny, Panegyric, 6. 5, 35, 50. 7. ‘Titus ‘securitati cavit’, when he put A. palm that Aequitas sometimes holds in place of the more usual measuring-rod is a symbol of rejoicing—later a stock attribute of Hilaritas.¹ The two types of Divus Augustus, Altar and Eagle, were deliberately revived to show Vespasian's desire to rank as successor of Augustus.² We may surmise that there was a marked revival of the worship of 'Divus Augustus'. Was the memory of Galba in some measure included? Men had spoken of Titus as a possible heir for Galba,³ and Vespasian's policy certainly was to recognize Galba as his predecessor. Why Galba was not definitely consecrated we can only surmise: perhaps it was felt that a man who had died a violent death in the streets of Rome could hardly be worshipped there as a god. But there was the precedent of Julius Caesar.

The rebuilding of the Capitol was actually in progress and the temple appears on the coins.⁴ The temple of Isis, near the Villa Publica, had sheltered Vespasian and Titus, when they came to Rome on the eve of their triumph. Hence the striking of the type. It is conceivable that Vespasian, who had so recently been in Egypt, had some additional reason for honouring the goddess. The temple, as shown on the coins, consisted of an outer 'peribolos' and an inner shrine of Egyptian pattern. The crescent-shaped pediment has Egyptian associations.⁵

The types of the quadrans are direct and plain—the palm-tree for Judaea, vexillum, trophy, spears and shields for victory, the emblems of priesthood for Vespasian as pontifex maximus. The raven on tripod is derived from the worship of 'augur Apollo'. The hand holding scales is a detail detached from the type of Aequitas.

The coinage of 71 is, then, of very considerable historical importance, representing, as it does, the considered commentary of the new government on the troubled chapter of history that had just closed. The study of the mints of Tarraco and Lugdunum will fill in some fresh details, but will not materially alter the picture. The posthumous coins of Galba seem to have been struck, mainly if not exclusively, at a Gallic mint, which is tentatively placed at Narbo. Definite points of contact with the Roman mint are seen in such types as Honos et Virtus, Libertas Restituta, Mars Victor.⁶ The honours paid to Galba were undoubtedly of importance at the time. He had enjoyed great popularity in Spain and Southern Gaul and in some circles in Rome, and Vespasian's respect for his memory must have helped to make his own rule acceptable in Italy and the west. A certain reluctance there must have been to accept the nominee of the Eastern armies; but Vespasian's success has almost hidden it from us.¹

The rarity of coins with legend, Cos. III Des. IIII, suggests that the designation only took place late in 71.

A.D. 72-3. The Cos. IIII issue of Vespasian is a continuation of a part of the Cos. III issue—with emphasis laid on Mars and Roma, on Pax, Salus and Victoria. The type of Vespasian as triumphator is for the triumph of June 71. The type of Victory inscribing shield is varied, the legend Victoria Aug. now being written in place of ob cives serv. A new type, Vespasian galloping right, in act to spear a fallen foe, looks rather to the end of the troubles in Gaul and Germany, than to the successes of Paetus in Commagene; the oblong shield held by the foeman is characteristically German.² Another type, showing Jew and Jewess kneeling suppliant before the victorious Vespasian, will indicate the measures taken, after the conquest, to regulate the affairs of the province anew.³ Titus has a series of issues, beginning with 72 (Cos. II) and extending into 73 (Tr. p. III Cos. II Imp. IIII).⁴ His types are drawn largely from his father's stock, Mars, Roma, Aequitas, Felicitas, Pax, Victoria. The Iudaea Capta with Titus standing behind the palm-tree is specially suitable for the conqueror of Jerusalem. We may note that the 'triumph' types on aes of Vespasian begin in 71, whereas on gold and silver they only start in the next year. Titus also shares his father's types, celebrating victories in Germany and the settlement in Judaea. Peculiar to Titus are the reverse of Domitian as princeps iuventutis and the distribution scene explained by the legend congiarium primum populo Romano datum: this distribution was probably given in especial honour of Titus's victory. The object held by the attendant, which is usually described as a tessera, is the chief attribute of the goddess Liberalitas; it is probably to be regarded rather as a counting-board or abacus.⁵ The statue of Minerva may suggest the place where the distribution took place—perhaps the temple of Minerva by the senate-house.⁶ The Fides Publica type, expressed by clasped hands (for Concordia), holding two corn-ears (agricultural prosperity) and caduceus (success in trade), seems to look forward to the imperial censorship of 73.¹ The Spes type indicates the hopes of the imperial family—Titus himself and his younger brother.

Domitian's issue as Cos. des. II must be of this year: even if, as we have suggested, he was already Cos. des. II in 71,² he will hardly have commenced to strike before his brother. The figure riding in the triumphal chariot on his as should be Vespasian himself, not Domitian—unless Domitian had the audacity to claim on his coinage a larger share in the triumph than actually fell to his lot.³ The temples of Jupiter Capitolinus and Vesta on his reverses suggest a particular interest in the rebuilding after the great fire—an interest explained by the part played by Domitian himself in the events of December 69.⁴

A.D. 73. The title of Censor now appears on coins of Vespasian and Titus. The range of allusions remains much the same as in 72—Mars, Aequitas, Concordia, Fortuna, Pax, Victory, triumphal quadriga, temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. The Mars Victor type revived may refer to successes in Judaea. The Felicitas holding a globe is the 'Prosperity of the World'. Pax is shown holding her own branch and the caduceus of Felicitas and leaning on the column of Securitas. Victory, whether or not expressly defined as Navalis, stands on the prow which suggests success at sea. Characteristic of the year is the round temple of Vesta here shown on a podium of two steps only, without statues right or left. The Spes type, appearing on coins of Vespasian, may suggest a new interest in Domitian as his heir. Titus continues to give prominence to the Jewish triumph and shows a predilection for types of Roma. Domitian now begins to take a large share in the coinage and strikes with many of his father's types. The Spes type is suitable to him, as to Titus, as heir, and the Provident. (Altar), which suggests the forethought that provides for the succession, strikes a similar note.⁵ His Pax type occasionally seems to show a pretty detail—a bird perched on the arm of the goddess. The eagle holding a wreath in its beak, with the eagle on globe of Titus, seems to have a reference to the worship of 'Divus Augustus'.⁶

A.D. 74. The coinage is of less bulk in this year and begins to show a more peaceful character. The fact that Vespasian actually strikes a princeps iuventutis type for Domitian may indicate some relenting on his part towards his younger son, who attempted by a show of self-restraint to atone for his earlier excesses.⁷ The rudder on globe of the quadrans is a symbol of the 'rector orbis'.⁸ The coin on which Titus as Cos. III appears with Domitian as Cos. II belongs to the January and February of the year. Domitian's issue as Cos. III extends from March 74 to the end of 75.

A.D. 75. A year with little coinage. The chief problem lies in Vespasian's type of Victory on the cista mystica. The obvious reference to Asia may mean that Roman coinage was now given regular currency there.¹ And, if we were right in placing the death of Mucianus in this year, we might see some significance in this reference to the scene of his chief activities in the role of Emperor-maker. The type of Minerva with wreath and palm, attributes of Victory, and the snake—perhaps the snake Erichthonius of Athena Parthenos—still awaits explanation.

A.D. 76. Again the 'Princip. Invent.' and Spes types bear witness to Vespasian's interest in his younger son. The 'Annona August.' foreshadows the Italian land policy, already discussed above.² From the reappearance of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the coins we conclude that it was completed in this year. It had been destroyed by fire in the conflicts of December 69, and the destruction of what ranked as a visible sign of Roman greatness made a deep impression both at Rome and in the world outside.³ Its restoration, therefore, had been one of the first concerns of the new government. The plan of the temple, Tacitus tells us, was unchanged⁴—such was the divine will ('nolle deos mutari veterem formam'), but the height was increased—'altitudo aedibus adiecta: id solum religio adnuere et prioris templi magnificentiae deuisse credebatur'. The new temple appears as hexastyle, on a podium of four steps. In the intercolumniations are Jupiter seated in the centre, with his 'σύνναοι', Juno and Minerva, standing to left and right of him. On the roof is a facing quadriga in the centre, with eagles on the corners. The details of the pediment are frequently obscure and do not agree on all specimens. On an as of A.D. 71 we see Jupiter standing between recumbent figures (?), on another specimen we see a wreath.⁵ The columns are clearly seen to be Corinthian. On the denarius of M. Volteius they are Doric, and the temple itself shows four columns; but the temple there shown is the old one, destroyed by fire in 83 B.C., and Tacitus's report about the absence of general alterations may be correct.

The quadrans with its rudder on globe and winged caduceus points to the commercial prosperity brought by good government.

The 'Genius P. R.' of Titus is a symbol of public vows—presumably for the first 'quinquennium' of his reign.¹ The same occasion may account for the type of 'Fortuna Redux', who had brought him home from the Eastern wars to share his father's power.

Domitian strikes the normal types of the heir apparent, 'Princip. Invent.' and Spes.

A.D. 77-78. The 'Annona' type is reinforced by a type of Ceres on the dupondius. The wreath, voted by S. P. Q. R. OB CIVES SERVATOS, and the 'Fortunae Reduci' and 'Iudaea Capta' types are preparatory for the 'Vota decennalia' of Vespasian. It is noteworthy that Domitian begins to take a fuller share in the general types of these years.

A.D. 79. There is very little coinage before the death of Vespasian. Domitian's coinage may belong mainly to the end of the year.

Apart from the commemoration of the merits of the new dynasty in restoring Roman supremacy after the great wars, the stress falls mainly on the peace and prosperity guaranteed by the government. Great stress is laid throughout—and increasingly after about A.D. 75—on the dynastic principle—a direct answer to the party that was disposed to question it.

Attribution and Style.

For the style of Tarraco we have the coins of Galba and Vitellius to guide us. Some features—in the form of letters and treatment of legend,³ in the general pose of the head, in the reverse figures, which are often curiously thin and elongated—unmistakably recur. The mint, however, had at first no reliable portrait of Vespasian, and produced three or four varying versions, none of them very like the reality. The denarii with head to the left are a little apart from the rest, and even seem to have Eastern affinities; a comparison with similar heads on the aes has, however, led to their being given to Tarraco here.¹ The chief engraver of the mint, though lacking in grace and polish, has contrived to put some character, usually with a touch of severity, into his profiles—for Titus and Domitian on their rare issues, as well as for their father. The later gold and silver coins interpret Roman models.

The aes of A.D. 69–70 is of obviously provincial workmanship. In A.D. 71 the artists work on the lines of the Roman mint, though retaining a touch of originality.² In A.D. 72 these issues appear to end.

Chronology.

N, R. The battle of Cremona was fought near the end of August 69, and must soon have led to the recognition of Vespasian in the West, including Spain. His coinage, therefore, began by about October of that year. The first issue has the curiously imperfect title IMP. CAESAR VESPASIANVS; the second adds AVG. after CAESAR,³ the legend reading outwardly as on coins of Vitellius. During the second issue the direction of legend is reversed, and, in the third issue, the legend of the Roman mint, IMP. CAESAR VESPASIANVS AVG.⁴ comes in. This issue belongs mainly to A.D. 70 (COS. ITER.), but runs on into 71 (COS. III). Our knowledge of the later history of the mint is imperfect. In A.D. 73 we find Titus and Domitian striking with their father. The mint seems to have closed in that year.

Aes. This coinage certainly begins later than the gold and silver, possibly not till A.D. 70 if, as seems probable, the earliest obverse is IMP. CAES. AVG. VESPAS. COS. II TR. POT.⁵ Few coins were struck before the great issue of A.D. 71, and still fewer in 72 after it.

Types and Legends. N, R.

The omission of Augustus from Vespasian's first obverse legend is remarkable, but, as the praenomen of 'imperator' is present, we can hardly see any strong trace of Republican sentiment.

The legend of Mars Ultor, the god who has wreaked his spite on the enemy, is taken over from the Civil Wars.⁶ The type, however, is varied; Mars is now represented not in the act of fighting, but carrying the trophy he has won in battle—a type so similar to the later type of Romulus that it has been styled a ‘Mars pater’—the father of the founder of Rome.¹

Another warrior—a legionary, rather than the war-god?—expresses the ‘Agreement of the Armies’, a necessary condition for Vespasian’s success.² The Hispania, expressing both the civil and military life of the province, confirms our attribution to this mint.³

In the third issue the standing Pax with the caduceus of Felicitas and the corn-ears and poppy of Ceres is also a type of Divus Augustus, which was probably struck at the same time.⁴ ‘Consensus Exercituum’ is rendered by an appropriate type, borrowed from Illyricum, of two eagle-bearers clasping hands. The fifth acclamation of Vespasian as ‘imperator’ is associated with the designation to a third consulship and probably falls late in A.D. 70.⁵ The type, Roma presenting a Victory to the Emperor, must celebrate an important success over the rebels in Gaul.⁶ ‘Libertas Publica’, a type of Galba restored, marks Vespasian as the true successor of that Emperor.⁷ In Spain, Galba’s own province, this association must have had its value. ‘Victoria Imp. Vespasiani’, with a Victory type of normal pattern, echoes the ‘Victoria Othonis’ and ‘Victoria Imp. Germanici’.⁸ Other types—Iudaea Capta, Neptune, Aequitas, Fortuna, Pax—are in the tradition of the Roman mint.

So far as the mint is not drawn into the circle of Rome, it preserves memories of Galba and of the Civil Wars and shows close connexion with the mints of Illyricum and, in a less degree, Lugdunum.

Aes.

A.D. 69–70. The first issues are very obviously provincial in style and show some originality in the choice of types, though there are borrowings from the gold and silver of the Roman mint—busts of Titus and Domitian, Titus and Domitian as ‘principes iuventutis’,⁹ Neptune, Fortuna, and Pax. The ‘Roma et Augustus cos. iterum tribun. pot.’ shows the same type as the aureus with ‘Imp. V p. p. cos. II desig. III’ discussed above. Roma and Augustus are, of course, the two deities of the imperial cult, which was strong in Spain, especially at Tarraco.¹ The legend 'Signis Receptis' will refer to the recovery of standards lost in the war against Civilis and the Gauls; the type shows Victory placing a legionary eagle in the hands of Vespasian. The sestertius, with legend 'T. et Dom. C. ex S. C.', shows the two princes seated as magistrates on platforms with attendants nearby. The 'C.' must be an abbreviation of 'Caesares' not 'Consules' for, whereas Titus was consul, Domitian was only praetor in this year (A.D. 70). It was a subtle compliment to Domitian to represent him on an equality with his brother. The legend accompanying the heads of the princes on an as, IMP. T. VES. COS. DESIGN. D. CAESAR AVG. F. COS. DESIGN., has, unfortunately, been retouched. 'Securitas P. Romani' recalls the coinages of Otho, Vitellius, and the Civil Wars.²

A.D. 71. Most of the types of this year have already been discussed under Rome. 'Fides Exercituum' is expressed by clasped hands, holding a legionary eagle on a prow; we think of the fleet of Ravenna which had transferred its allegiance in good time to Vespasian.³ The facing type of 'Mars Victor', with the spear and trophy, occurs again on posthumous coins of Galba.⁴ Roma with her seven hills—obviously a well-known representation, as a passage like Revelations xvii. 1-9 proves—is certainly a 'Roma Renascens'; that is the meaning of the addition of the she-wolf and twins and Tiber to the type.⁵ The statuette of Pax held by the standing Roma marks her as 'Pacifera'. The 'Spes Augusta' with a figure of Spes offering her flower to a helmeted figure, with two companions, is certainly the 'Hope of the Imperial House'. The figures are probably Vespasian and his two sons—all soldiers who had been fighting Rome's battles. It is less likely that we are to recognize Domitian with two soldiers; such prominence could hardly be given to his activities in Gaul as late as A.D. 71.

The only type of the mint of A.D. 72 is a Pax type of normal pattern. It is a fitting conclusion to the coinage of the Civil Wars in Spain.

Attribution and Style.

Early in the reign we find a mint, showing close affinities to Lugdunum, less close to Tarraco, Illyricum, and the East. Comparison of styles makes it improbable that it is only an early stage of Lugdunum, and, if we take into our survey coins of Galba, struck in Gaul in and after his lifetime,¹ we shall be inclined to attribute all to Galba's main Gallic mint—probably Narbo. The attribution of posthumous coins of Galba in B. M. C., Emp., i, pp. ccxii, 351 ff., will then need correction; it becomes very doubtful whether any of the coins there described were struck either at Rome or at Lugdunum.

The individual style of the mint is seen in the straight set of the head and in the treatment of the profile, which is very similar on the long face of Galba and the shorter face of Vespasian. The lettering, too, is distinctive—smaller and less floriate than that of Lugdunum. Over the aes, which is almost all posthumous of Galba, very great care must have been taken; the best portraits reach a high level of dignity and the reverse types are pictorial and well-conceived.

Chronology.

The obverse legend of Vespasian, IMP · CAESAR VESPASIANVS AVG ·, read from left to right, is an early one, mainly of the year A.D. 70. The aes of Vespasian is of A.D. 71 (COS. III). There are practically no reverse types that suggest a later date than this.² The posthumous coins of Galba are all undated. Some may belong to A.D. 70:³ the bulk of the aes probably formed a part of the great issue of the next year.

Types.

A, R. Most of the types are shared with other mints—the busts of Titus and Domitian, the Fortuna, Pax, and Judaea with Rome, the two soldiers who express the 'Agreement of the Armies' with Spain and Illyricum, the 'Judaea Devicta' with Lugdunum, the 'Concordia Aug.' (Ceres type) with the East.

A few more distinctive types remain. 'Fortuna Augusti', with the normal attributes, rudder and cornucopiae, is the first reference on coins to the dazzling fortune that had raised Vespasian from obscurity to the pinnacle of earthly greatness. 'Iustitia Aug.' should refer to some striking display of Vespasian's justice; the sceptre is a stock attribute denoting dignity, but the corn-ears suggest that we should look for some reference to the cultivation of the land. 'Mars Conservator'—the epithet is quite unusual on coins—speaks eloquently of the defensive war against the rebels on the Rhine. The triumph type of Vespasian and his two sons is interesting as being decidedly earlier than similar types of the Roman mint. 'Virtus August.' acclaims the prowess of the Emperor, which had a suitable field in Gaul for its display. The clasped hands holding legionary eagle between two standards is an expression of the 'Harmony of the Armies'. A single example of the Vesta temple of A.D. 72-73 seems to prolong the operations of the mint down to those years.

The posthumous issues of Galba refer to the alliance of Gaul and Spain, to the victory of Rome, to the Fortune of the Emperor, to Pax representing the 'Happiness of the World' (holding globe and caduceus, and, sometimes, corn-ears in place of her usual branch). The meaning of 'Aequitas' in this context is uncertain (but see below).

Aes. The only types of this mint yet identified for Vespasian are a normal 'Iudaea Capta' and 'S. P. Q. R. ob cives servatos' in oak-wreath: but it may well be that the list is still incomplete. The posthumous types of Galba¹ trace his rise from governorship in Spain to Empire at Rome, the oracle received at Clunia, the restoration of Liberty, the 'Distinction and Valour of his troops', the imperial 'Adlocutio'. For the 'Senatus Pietati Augusti' and its connexion with Vespasian's type of 'Concordia Senatui', see above p. xlviii. It would have seemed natural that both types should be struck at the same mint, but the evidence of style is against this. The 'Victoria Imperi Romani' emphasizes the true Empire—the Roman—as against the shadowy 'imperium Galliarum'. Other types show Pax burning enemy arms, Fides Publica, Salus Augusti, Securitas P(opuli) Romani, and Victoria. The references to Aequitas here are puzzling. Aequitas suggests the imperial care for the material well-being of the subjects by the kindly provision of corn and perhaps also of money in largesses. Galba had promised a 'liberalitas', which he never actually paid. Did Vespasian make good the omission and distribute his first largesse under the name of Galba as well as his own?

Attribution and Style.

The Lugdunum coins of Vespasian are distinguished by a series of characteristic portraits, at first with long profiles and heavy and severe features, later with rounder heads and a more cheerful expression. The lettering is clearly defined by its neat and close arrangement and by its flourishes. The aes of the early years runs fairly close to the gold and silver. In the later years there is no gold and silver with which to compare it; but it develops naturally out of the earlier series, has distinctive portraits of Vespasian and his sons, unlike the Roman, has some distinctive forms of legend, and a selection of reverse types peculiar to itself.

We have, then, to deal with a large mint, which, from its general affinities of types and style, must be Western rather than Eastern. Since Spain has already been provided for, we turn inevitably to Gaul and we find that everything points to Lugdunum as the seat of the mint. Only so can we explain the decided resemblance of the gold and silver to gold and silver of Vitellius and of the aes to aes of Nero, already attributed on good grounds to that mint. Lugdunum had struck in the precious metals from the reign of Augustus to the beginning of that of Caligula, and had been revived by Nero as a subsidiary mint for aes. Closed by Galba as a punishment for the support given by the town to Nero, the mint had been gradually restored by Vitellius, and passed with his death to his successful rival. The large issues of gold and silver in the first years of the reign were needed for the great campaign against the Gallic rebels. In continuing to issue aes from this mint Vespasian was continuing the wise policy of Nero, who aimed at giving the West its own supplies of small change.

Certain minor differences of style, observable in the coins here assigned to Lugdunum, are probably to be taken as evidence of several officinae in the one mint, rather than of a diversity of mints.

Chronology.

Most of the coins of the mint are dated, and the only questions that arise have already been discussed above (pp. xxviii ff.).

The first issue, with TR. P. on obverse, includes a number of reverses dated to A.D. 70 (COS. II), but also some that may well be earlier: it is probable that it begins about November 69.

Types.

A? R. Many of the types have already been discussed under other mints,—Mars, Neptune, Aequitas, Fortuna Redux, and Iudaea under Rome, 'Consen. Exercit.' under Spain, 'Fortuna Augusti' under the uncertain Gallic mint. The figure holding globe and caduceus, with the accompanying legend, Cos. III Fort. Red., may be interpreted as Fortuna restoring the 'Felicitas Orbis'.¹ The standing Iudaea is characteristic of this mint. The epithet, 'devicta', makes explicit what is clearly implied in the type itself. 'Libertas Restituta',² which recalls the war-cry of

² Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. 339, No. 177, &c.: also p. 370, No. 13, Vitellius.

Galba in 68, claims for Vespasian too the title of constitutional Emperor; the wreath, held in the right hand in place of the more usual pileus, is a symbol of rejoicing. As at Rome, Titus and Domitian, as 'principes iuventutis', figure on the reverses of their father and, later, have issues of their own. The 'triumphus' type is interesting both from its date soon after the actual event, and from the graphic picture which it offers of the triumph, with the captive escorted by the legionary, and the trumpeter; but the coin is on too small a scale to add anything to our knowledge. Here again the legend, 'triumph. Aug.', adds what is often left to be understood. A Victory of rather unusual type holds a shield, no doubt supposed to be inscribed with some record of the occasion, above her head.

The later issues show certain types, shared with Rome—e.g. Pax Augusta and the temple of Vesta, a 'Victoria Orbis' standing on a globe, and coins of the two sons of Vespasian. The main feature is the revival of the type of Claudius, Nemesis advancing to right with a snake and the legend 'Paci Augusti'. The reference obviously is to the suppression of the Gallic revolt and the restoration of the Augustan peace. Nemesis is the punisher of sin; but she is also the power who warns the victor himself, the instrument of her vengeance, not to offend against her laws of measure and proportion.¹ There is an interesting variety in the type of the temple of Vesta. On the Roman coin, the figure to the left of the temple seems to be Mercury with his purse; here we find a standing figure, holding a sceptre. Is it not probable that we have here the Gallic Mercury, Lug, the tutelary deity of Lugdunum with a native attribute?

Aes. The most distinctive types of the first years are the 'Roma Resurge(n)s' and the 'Aeternitas P. R.', with Victory presenting to Vespasian the palladium, the symbol of Rome's immortal destiny. Both types serve as reminders to the West that the troubles of the time are but a passing episode and that Rome is emerging the stronger from her hour of trial.

In the great issue of 71 Lugdunum plays a worthy part. Characteristic of the mint are the 'Fides Exercituum', clasped hands holding a legionary eagle set on a prow—the Rhine fleet played an important part in the operations against Civilis—a Victory inscribing a shield with the legend

¹ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, pp. cliii, 165 ff. (legend, PACI AVGVSTAE). Rostovtzeff, in a recent article in the Journal of Egyptian Archaeology (1926, pp. 24 ff.), identifies this 'Pax Nemesis' with the Ειρήνη Σεβαστῆ Κλαυδιανή, mentioned in the letter of Claudius to the Alexandrians, and works out some very interesting theories about the relations of this figure to the Jews in Alexandrian politics. There are difficulties in his view, but it is of considerable value. Pliny, Nat. Hist. (xi. 103. 251), perhaps helps to explain the apotropaic gesture shown on the coins: 'behind the right ear is the place of Nemesis . . . and there we place 'tactum ore proximum a minimo digitum veniam sermonis a diis ibi recondentes.'

'Devicta Iudaea', and the wreath offered by the senate and people of Rome to the 'Assertor of the Public Liberty'. The as, with Victory carrying a shield, is a revival of a favourite type of Nero;¹ the altar ('Provident.') and the eagle are restorations of the coins, struck by Tiberius for Divus Augustus, which seem to have circulated particularly in the West.² The eagle is a symbol of immortality, whilst providence here suggests the care of heaven for the Roman Empire. A variant of the type of Fides Publica, peculiar to Lugdunum, shows Fides holding patera and cornucopiae, in place of the usual corn-ears and basket of fruits.³ Fides is here assimilated in character to Concordia.

The issue of 72 is of considerable extent, but works with normal Roman types. The legend accompanying the standing figures of Titus and Domitian is unfortunately too badly blundered to give us any help with our problems of dating. The type of Securitas was not without reason popular in Gaul after the terrors of the revolt. The type of Pax sacrificing, which is peculiar to Lugdunum, conveys the thought of thanksgiving for peace and prosperity (cp. the caduceus held by Pax) restored.

Between 73 and 77 there is an almost complete interruption of the operations of the mint. In 77 and 78, however, we find an extensive issue, in which Titus and Domitian now join, consisting of a few sestertii beside a mass of dupondii and asses. The general theme of the coinage is the same as that of contemporary Roman issues, the praise of Roma, the commemoration of the capture of Iudaea, the celebration of the 'Salus Augusta', 'Victoria Augusti' and 'Fides Publica'. The rare type 'Felicita(tis) Reducis', represented by a woman holding patera and branch, probably belongs to the 'vota decennialia', the return of the happy occasion of Vespasian's accession. Felicitas bears the attributes of Concordia and Pax: the very unusual genitive case seems to imply that Concordia and Pax are the gift of the Emperor, whose continuance in power is here celebrated. Titus pays particular attention to types of Pax, whilst Domitian, as heir apparent, strikes types of Spes and of himself as 'Princeps Iuventutis'.

The last small issue of Vespasian (A.D. 79) has one remarkable type to show, 'Fides Fortuna', with attributes, patera and cornucopiae. Just as Fortuna as 'Felix' may be associated with Felicitas, so is she here with Fides: the restoration of faith, confidence, credit is the chief gift of Fortuna under Vespasian to Rome. The special popularity of Fides types in Gaul prove that they refer primarily to reconstruction after war.

MINT OF ILLYRICUM.

Denominations.

N.	Aureus.
A.	Denarius.
Orichalcum.	Sestertius. ¹

Attribution and Style.

One small series of denarii, with perhaps a very few aurei and sestertii, shows a style that cannot be exactly paralleled either earlier or later. Its date is obviously early, its types are rather Western than Eastern in their affinities. One small mannerism—the occasional arrangement of the reverse legend in two vertical lines—is also found at Tarraco. There can be no serious doubt that we have here the coinage of the legions of Illyricum, which, under the leadership of Antonius Primus, won Italy for Vespasian. The seat of the mint must remain for the present uncertain. Poetovio, the scene of the council of war, has been suggested; but perhaps Aquileia, so much nearer the seat of operations, is more likely.² The style is slightly crude, but not lacking in vigour. The heads are, as a rule, rather small and in very high relief; a larger head seems to come in a little later. The portraits, though not unexpressive, bear little resemblance to other portraits of Vespasian. The figures of the reverse are often remarkably neat and small. The lettering is of medium size, a little irregular in arrangement. An inner circle, within the circle of dots, is sometimes to be seen.

The two distinct styles of head probably represent earlier and later work or the work of two officinae in one mint, rather than two distinct mints.

Chronology.

The obverse legend, IMP · CAESAR VESPASIANVS AVG · (read from l. to r.), the character of the reverse types, the indications of history—all lead us to attribute this series to the early months of the reign, from about August 69 onwards. The sestertius, with P · M · TR · P on obverse, if rightly attributed, will show the mint still at work late in A.D. 70.

Types.

N, A. The types show two tendencies, closely related to one another, military and propagandist.

(1) Military.

Vespasian appears as general addressing his victorious troops (IM-

¹ Attribution uncertain; but note the general style of the head and especially the high relief (see p. 217 no. 878).

PER(ator)), and Titus has the same type.¹ Titus and Domitian appear as 'principes iuventutis', armed warriors on horseback. The two soldiers greeting one another represent the 'Alliance of the Army', more especially the alliance between the legions of Illyricum and the East.²

(2) The 'principes iuventutis' types—the seated 'civil' type as well as the military one—stress the promise of the new dynasty. The 'Genius of the Roman people', 'Roma Perpetua' and 'Roma Resurgens' appeal to the unchanging Rome, of which Vespasian claims to be the true representative. 'Roma Perpetua' holds the emblem of Victory and, in the 'Roma Resurgens' type, Vespasian appears as 'restitutor'. Finally, a type of Bonus Eventus, with the legend 'Pacis Eventum', points to the 'Happy issue (consisting) of peace'. Bonus Eventus, a figure akin to the Genius P. R., was equated with the Ἀγαθὸς Δαίμων of Alexandrian coins;³ a reference to Vespasian in Egypt is perhaps to be seen here.

The use of the accusative case, depending on some verb understood, in the legends 'Genium P. R.', 'Pacis Eventum' is very rare and characteristic of this mint. Perhaps the erection of statues (some word like 'posuit' being understood) is implied.⁴

Aes. The one sestertius, which may be attributed to the mint, shows Titus and Domitian, as 'principes iuventutis' on horseback, preceded by a foot-soldier, a type reminiscent of Nero's 'Decursio'.⁵

*Attribution, Style and Chronology.*⁶

As these questions are closely interrelated in this series, we will discuss them together, beginning with chronology.

The dating, in itself, is simple. First come coins with legend, IMP. CAES(ar) VESPAS(ianus) AVG., which must run from soon after 1 July 69. Then follows a group dated COS. II (A.D. 70), then one dated COS. III

¹ That is to say, if this attribution to Titus is correct. (See below, p. 87, no. †). It is based on the portraiture, but all that remains of the legend would fit Vespasian, and if the coin really belongs to Titus, it is the only one struck in his father's lifetime that gives him the title of Augustus.

(A.D. 71) and a third with COS.V (A.D. 74). A group, in rather different style, datable to A.D. 76, may belong to the same part of the world.

The undated issue of A.D. 69 shows either no mint-mark or mint-marks \oplus , ∇ (the latter very rare). The mint-marks of A.D. 70 are \oplus and \gg , those of A.D. 71 the same two, with the addition of EPE. In the issue of A.D. 74 the mint-mark is a star, sometimes perhaps with an \circ added. The mint-mark of the issue of A.D. 76, which cannot, however, be read on all coins, is \circ . Titus shares in the issues of A.D. 71, 74 and 76, Domitian in those of A.D. 71 and 76 only. The issue of A.D. 74 is without much doubt in celebration of the 'Vota V'; that fact accounts for the omission of Domitian and for the use of a star as mint-mark.

EPE is, of course, the mint-mark of Ephesus. \gg , in all probability, stands for Byzantium, the mustering place of Vespasian's naval forces.¹ The interpretation of \oplus and ∇ is more doubtful. Hill has suggested Philippi—an ingenious suggestion, for \oplus might then be the Greek Φ (ϕ λ ι π π \circ ι) and ∇ the Latin 'Pilippi'²; but we should perhaps hardly expect to find a mint there, and it is not certain that the two marks belong to the same mint. There seems, however, to be no other likely town beginning with Φ .³ All that we can say for certain is that the two mint-marks probably denote a mint or mints in or near the province of Asia. The star issue continues the coinage of Ephesus, but is not necessarily of that mint. If indeed the mint-mark \circ occurs on it, we should have rather to assign it to the same mint as the issue of A.D. 76, where that mint-mark certainly occurs. The site of the \circ mint is at present doubtful.⁴

The undated series of A.D. 69 shows two portraits—one large and rugged, one gentler and milder. The \oplus coins show this second portrait, the rare ∇ coins a slight variation of it.

The issues of A.D. 70 all show a small neat portrait. There is no marked distinction of style between the coins with the three separate mint-marks, \oplus , \gg , and EPE. Again, in the issue of A.D. 71, coins with \gg and EPE are in closely similar styles.

The most probable conclusion seems to be that the coinage is essentially one throughout, and that the successive mint-marks indicate rather a change of head-quarters rather than a change of personnel.

The style of the issue of A.D. 74 is more vigorous, but less neat than that of Ephesus, and shows some resemblance to that of the issue of A.D. 76. This last issue is marked by large heads and a curiously flat, but not

Obverses. There are two features of note here:

(1) In the issues of A.D. 71 and 74 Titus bears the praenomen ofimperator.¹ This is quite contrary to normal Roman usage and seems to be constitutionally incorrect; for, had Titus really possessed the imperium to the same full extent as his father, he would presumably have been joint Emperor like L. Verus beside Marcus Aurelius, not, as he was, colleague, like Tiberius beside Augustus. The fact that the use of the praenomen for Titus occurs as late as A.D. 74 seems to rule out the possibility that it was a case of presumption on the part of the son against the father. It might be regarded simply as an error due to imperfect or misunderstood instructions. In the issue of A.D. 76 it was corrected.

(2) In the issue of A.D. 71 Domitian wears the cuirass—apparently a reference to his campaign in Gaul in A.D. 70. Again, as in the case of Titus, we feel some degree of surprise at the paying of such a compliment, especially as Vespasian, on his return to Rome, had found it necessary to administer to Domitian a very effective snub.²

It is possible that there is a trace of the influence of Mucianus, who had at one time been an enemy of Vespasian and was reconciled to him chiefly through his friendship for Titus.³ He may easily have been disposed to assign a rather higher rank to the princes than their father would allow. But in any case we must not overrate the importance of such minor matters of form.

Reverses.

A.D. 69–74. We have to deal with a narrow range of types, which recur again and again. Titus and Domitian, described as the ‘children of the Emperor Augustus Vespasian’, are represented by busts or by standing figures, holding paterae as priests. An aureus, struck late in A.D. 71, describes Domitian as ‘consul’, Titus as ‘tribunicia potestate’. The type, AVG. in wreath, is struck for Titus and Domitian, as well as for Vespasian, and it has been suggested that it must therefore be read as ‘Augur’ rather than as ‘Augustus’. The close connexion of the two words is familiar.⁴

¹ For the use of the imperator title by Titus, see B. Pick in Z. f. N., 1885, pp. 190 ff. 1886, pp. 294 ff., and particularly 322 ff.

² Cp. Suetonius, Domitian, 2 ‘ob haec correptus, quo magis et aetatis et conditionis admoneretur, habitabat cum patre una,’ &c.

³ Tac. Hist. ii. 5 ‘... dein praecipua concordiae fides Titus prava certamina communi utilitate aboleverat. . .’; ii. 77, speech of Mucianus, ‘absurdum fuerit non cedere imperio ei cuius filium adoptaturus essem, si ipse imperarem’.

⁴ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. lxviii and refs. But we might interpret it as AVG(VSTVS) for Vespasian, as AVG(ur) or perhaps as AVG(usti filius) for Titus and Domitian.

The exact nature of the wreath is hard to determine—the laurel-wreath of ‘augur Apollo’ might seem more in place than the civic oak. ‘Concordia Aug(usta)’ expresses the harmony in the imperial family, reaching out beyond the family into the state. The accompanying type is no Roman Concordia, but what we should ordinarily term a Ceres.¹ Here, in a part of the world where the fertility of the ground was always in men’s thoughts, it may be a local expression of the fruits of harmony. Again, with the legends of Pax, ‘Paci Augustae’ and ‘Paci Orb. Terr. Aug.’, we notice a discrepancy between type and legend. ‘Paci Augustae’ is expressed by Victory with wreath and palm, ‘Paci Orb. Terr. Aug.’ by a draped female bust, wearing a crown of towers—a city Tyche (of Rome?) or perhaps Cybele, the Great Mother herself. In each case the legend seems to define the goal of the activities of the figure represented, not the figure itself. ‘Paci Orb. Terr. Aug.’ is a deliberate echo of the ‘Pax Orbis Terrarum’ of Otho. Vespasian at first claimed to appear as the avenger of Otho.² In the West he found it convenient to let the connexion drop and appear instead as the successor of Galba, but there, in the East, the type persists as late as 74.

The unique cistophorus of Vespasian in the British Museum has the reverse type of the Emperor in a temple crowned by a figure of Asia (?)—a type already used by Claudius and revived later by Nerva and Trajan.³

A.D. 76. The types of this issue are nearly all taken over from the Roman mint. The fighting Minerva of Titus is new.⁴ The winged caduceus stands for commercial prosperity, the caduceus, corn-ears, and poppies in clasped hands for prosperity in an even wider sense as the fruit of concord—the accompanying legend ‘Fides Publica’ sounds again one of the key-notes of the reign. Spes represents Domitian, the ‘princeps iuventutis’, as the hope of the imperial line. The type of Pegasus was struck by Domitian at Rome in this year and may allude to his poetic aspirations.⁵ Here, where it is struck by Vespasian too, it might conceivably bear a local reference—to the legend of Bellerophon in Lycia, if indeed the \circ mint is to be sought there. The eagle on a column is probably a funeral eagle and appears in honour of the memory of Mucianus, whose prestige in Asia, where he had built up the cause of Vespasian, must have been immense.

Only one type is known on the two denominations struck at this mint, that of Titus and Domitian, each Caesar and 'son of Augustus', Titus as 'consul', Domitian as 'praetor'. The date is A.D. 70. The style is sufficiently distinctive to justify the supposition of a special mint and suggests the East rather than the West, but the exact place of striking is quite uncertain.

Attribution and Style.

A, R. Several groups of coins, undated or of the years A.D. 71-72, show a style that is markedly Eastern and yet quite distinct from the groups centring round Ephesus. It must clearly belong to the South-East, Syria, Phoenicia and Egypt, where the foundations of Vespasian's power were laid.

Coming to the question of mints, we think first of Antioch, where, as Tacitus (Histories ii. 82) tells us, Vespasian at once struck gold and silver. To Antioch, then, we attribute a group of undated coins, which must come early in the reign—in crude style, with very irregular lettering, with blanks that might well have been chopped off bars or plates of metal. The portraits, rugged but not without feeling, closely resemble those on tetradrachms of Antioch.

A later group of aurei and denarii, with types of the Roman mint, still betrays Eastern origin by some peculiarities of style—notably the curious finish to the bust of Vespasian, and the draped bust of Titus, seen half from behind. This, too, may be tentatively assigned to Antioch.

The mint of Alexandria owes its discovery to Laffranchi, though we cannot follow him in all his attributions.² A few aurei with head to the left show portraits remarkably like those of Alexandrian billon and one specimen in B. M. seem actually to bear a minute mint-mark, AA. The undated denarius and the dated aurei (A.D. 72, Cos. IIII) with a massive head to the left, may belong to the same mint. The lettering of these coins is rough, the portraiture a little more refined than that of the early coins attributed to Antioch.

¹ The striking of As and Semis in orichalcum, not copper, is a special feature of this mint.

² R. It., 1915, pp. 153 ff., and references.

A small group of aurei of Vespasian and Titus clearly belongs to the same mint as that which issues the tetradrachms described in B. M. C., Phoenicia, p. 298, no. 3, &c. It is certainly not Antioch, but lies in the same part of the world. Tyre is a probable suggestion. The portraits of this mint show considerable delicacy—with long fine heads and sensitive features. The lettering is bold and fairly regular. The reverse types, however, betray lack of experience and are remarkably awkward and angular.

A unique aureus, with radiate head of Vespasian, and a portrait unlike any other, may come from a mint in Judaea—possibly Caesarea.

Æ. We have one group, showing a general uniformity of style—probably the products of a single mint. One or two very rare coins, described on p. 220, with S.C. on rev., are not certainly of this class and might possibly belong rather to the province of Asia.¹

There can be no serious doubt that the mint in question is in Commagene.² The most characteristic type, caduceus and crossed cornucopiae, is native to that country and recalls the issues of Tiberius, also attributed to the same place. Tiberius had first incorporated Commagene in the Empire, but, under Caligula, it had reverted to native princes. Vespasian, on finally annexing the country in A.D. 72, revived the local coinage struck by Tiberius.

The style is decidedly good and does not fall below a good Roman standard; the dies, in fact, might well have been prepared in Rome. The fabric, however, and the absence of S.C. from many of the issues both point to provincial issue.

Chronology.

There are no serious difficulties here. The undated coins of Antioch, Alexandria, Tyre and Judaea (?) are all early—probably of the first few months of the reign. The aureus of Tyre with PONT. MAX. TRIB. POT. on reverse cannot be earlier than the close of A.D. 70. The rare coins of Vespasian with obverse, IMP. CAES. VESP. AVG. P. M., belong mainly to A.D. 71. Most other issues are dated. That of Titus, with FR. POT., runs parallel to Vespasian's with COS. IIII.

Some of the small undated coins of Commagene may have been struck about the middle of the reign.

² Cp. Mowat's pioneer article in R. N., 1911, pp. 423 ff.; B. M. C., Emp., i, p. cxli.

Types.

A, R.

Obverse. Titus, but not Domitian, shares with his father in the coinage. Here, as in Asia, Titus sometimes bears the praenomen of imperator. In the Antioch issue of A.D. 72, however, he adopts the normal Roman style, T. CAES. IMP. VESP.

Reverse.

Antioch (undated). The AVG. in wreath has already been discussed above. Two types of Virtus celebrate the military prowess of the Emperor. The foot set on a prow on one of them calls attention to the naval aspect of the war.

The small issue of A.D. 71 (obv. IMP. CAES. VESP. AVG. P. M.) includes the type of PACI ORB. TERR. AVG., already discussed in the coinage of Asia above.

The issue of A.D. 72 uses types of the Roman mint, Neptune the home-bringer, captive Judaea, Vespasian and Titus triumphing, Victory crowning a standard. The 'Concordia Augusti' is a Roman Concordia with patera and cornucopiae, not an Asiatic, with corn-ears and poppy.

Alexandria. Domitian appears with his brother on the reverse of one aureus. The type of Vespasian as restorer of a towered woman, probably representing the 'Orbis Terrarum', is explained by the legend PAX AVGVSTI. The genitive AVGVSTI makes Peace here not merely a state, but an active quality of the Emperor—that in him which makes him a 'pacifer' or 'bringer of peace'.¹ The rare undated denarius shows a Victory standing on the globe of the world.

The mint of Tyre has a Roma with the parazonium of Virtus, a Pax with branch and sceptre, a Concordia with patera and cornucopiae—all of normal Roman pattern. Titus has a type celebrating the 'Overthrow of Judaea' by a Victory inscribing IMP. T. CAESAR on a shield, set on the Jewish palm. The same shield, resting on crossed spears, is detached to serve as a type for Vespasian. The praenomen of Imperator is here assigned to Titus as a definite outcome of his Jewish victory.

Other types call for no special comment.

Commagene. The winged caduceus, above or between cornucopiae, as always, symbolizes prosperity. Titus has a type of Judaea Capta mourning at the foot of her palm. S. C. is usually omitted, except when it is in a laurel-wreath as the sole type—reminding us of the S. C. issues of Antioch.

In A.D. 77–78 Vespasian has types of Jupiter and Ceres, Titus of the eagle, the bird of Jupiter, on a thunderbolt. The place of mint of these coins is, however, uncertain, and we cannot define any special occasion for their issue.

MINT OF ROME.

Denominations.

A.	Aureus.
Æ.	Denarius, Quinarius.
Aes.
Orichalcum.	Sestertius, Dupondius.
Copper.	As, Quadrans.

Attribution and Style.

The gold of Titus, and the silver, with the exception of the Asiatic 'cistophorus', seem to belong exclusively to the mint of Rome. The only coins that diverge from the normal may fairly be termed 'barbarous imitations'—products of antiquity, indeed, but not of any regular mint. The aes is still issued in part from the mint of Lugdunum.

The style of the gold and silver is neat and fine, less vigorous but more ornate than the earlier coinage of Vespasian. The portraits are small but well-characterized, the lettering is small, firm, and regular.

The style of the aes of Rome is a direct continuation from the last issues of Vespasian: compared with that of the gold and silver it shows less refinement but more power. Lugdunum has a well-defined style of its own, with massive portraits, often bearing an expression of intense concentration, and ample figures on the reverse, with large heads and well-marked features.

Chronology.

A. R. This is rendered simple in the main by the numbered titles of Titus. The first issue (with TR. P. VIII) can have lasted only a few days, 23 June to 1 July, from the death of Vespasian to the beginning of Titus's new tribunician year. A second issue, also very short, is later than 1 July (cp. TR. P. VIII), but has no mention of the IMP. XIII. Three more issues follow before the close of the year—the first mentioning the IMP. XIII, the second adding the title P. P., the third celebrating the IMP. XV. The exact occasions of the two victories, which brought Titus these acclamations, are not known, but they were probably both British. Finally, Titus's issue of A.D. 80 (COS. VIII) does not last beyond 1 July; he has always TR. P. VIII, never TR. P. X. The undated coins cannot, for the most part, be exactly placed: a few are seen from the title, IMP. T. VESPASIANVS AVG., to be extremely early.

The coinage of Domitian is partly of A.D. 79 (COS. VI), partly of A.D. 80-81 (COS. VII). Domitian, who always mentions his relationship to the dead Emperor, is still 'Aug(usti) f(ilius)' not 'Divi f(ilius)' for the first part of the issue of A.D. 80. The consecration of Vespasian, then, was not formally carried through until that year, and the coinage of 'Divus Augustus Vespasianus' will only begin then.¹ Contemporary with it will be the rare denarii of Diva Domitilla. The coinage of Julia cannot be dated with any precision.

Although a stoppage of the coinage before 1 July, A.D. 80 can only be proved for Titus, it must have applied equally to the other issues, if we are right in supposing that it was due to special difficulties occasioned by the great fire of Rome. The site of the imperial mint in the early Empire is not known: it may have stood, with or near the senatorial, in the temple of Juno Moneta on the Capitoline hill. And that hill, we know, suffered severely from the fire.

Aes. Titus has a moderate issue of A.D. 79 (COS. VII), a large one of A.D. 80-81 (COS. VIII), as also has Domitian (COS. VI, COS. VII); Domitian's issue of A.D. 80 has almost always the title 'Divi Vesp. f(ilius)' not 'Aug(usti) f(ilius)'. The coins of Divus Vespasianus and Julia are to be dated in the same way as the gold and silver. The Domitilla for whom Titus strikes a sestertius may well be the same who was afterwards deified,²

¹ Cp. J. R. S., 1926, pp. 95 ff., A. H. Smith on a diploma of Titus; C. I. L. vi. 1296 shows Titus, COS. VII IMP. XV DIVI F. against the evidence of the coins.

² There were two ladies of the family called Domitilla—the elder, the wife of Vespasian, and the younger, her daughter, who both died before Vespasian became Emperor. As Statius, Silvae, i. 197 ff., names the daughter, but not the mother, among the Flavian 'divi', it is customary now to attribute the DIVA DOMITILLA coins to the daughter. The types rather favour the other view. The 'memoriae Domitillae' might refer to Domitilla the elder, but may equally well refer to her daughter.

and, if so, these coins belong to A. D. 79 and early 80. The restored coins of Titus are all dated by his eighth consulship (A. D. 80-81).

There is no direct evidence in the coins themselves of any stoppage before 1 July, A. D. 80, such as we have observed in the gold and silver. It is, however, extremely probable that the senatorial mint, still housed in the temple of Juno Moneta, was put out of action in the fire. Large as are the issues of A. D. 80, they may still have been put forth in the early months of the year: the Roman mint could on occasion work under very high pressure.

Types and Legends. A, R.

Titus, on his accession, assumes the praenomen of imperator, but distinguishes himself from his father by inserting his personal name, Titus between Imp. and Caesar. After the very first issues he regularly bears the title of 'pontifex maximus' and 'pater patriae', and usually sets out his imperial title, with numbered tribunician power, imperator title, and consulship, in full.

The earliest reverse types—captive and trophy, rostral column, Ceres and Venus Victrix—are carried over from the reign of Vespasian.¹ New for this period is the quadriga carrying a basket of corn-ears—borrowed from the coinage of L. Aquillius and M. Durmius, moneyers of Augustus in 18 B.C.² As Laffranchi has shown, it is the procession of the calathus of Ceres that is depicted, described by Callimachus in his Hymn.³ The type of capricorn and globe, already struck under Vespasian, is another borrowing from Augustus. Was the capricorn Titus's own natal sign?⁴

In the coinage of A. D. 80 the two captives probably symbolize a victory in Britian, though, as we shall see below, the Jewish victory was not forgotten. The elephant stands for the games, lasting two days, given in honour of the dedication of the Coliseum.⁵ But the main feature of the new issue is the series of types of pulvinaria, or sacred couches of the gods, associated with a supplicatio and lectisternium voted by the senate after the eruption of Vesuvius.⁶ Such services of prayer and propitiation had been customary from early times in Rome, when some signal disaster inclined men to seek peace with heaven (pacem deum exposcere); as late as A. D. 64 the Great Fire of Rome had been atoned for by similar observances.¹ Such services were directed by the XViri sacris faciundis at the bidding of the Sibylline books. On the pulvinaria were set out, as a rule, not actual images of the gods, but attributes or emblems (exuviae) or a species of wreath, called struppi (στρόφια), which served as conventional representations of divine heads.² Of the details of the service of A.D. 80 the coins are the only memorial; but it may well have followed the general order of that held after the disaster of Lake Trasimene, 217 B.C., when couches were spread for the gods and goddesses in pairs—one for Jupiter and Juno, a second for Neptune and Minerva, a third for Mars and Venus, a fourth for Apollo and Diana, a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta, a sixth for Mercury and Ceres.³ Turning to our coin-types we find a thunderbolt on a throne—the pulvinar of Jupiter and perhaps of Juno too. Dolphin and anchor represent the pulvinar of Neptune, a helmet on a table (contemporary type of Domitian) that of Minerva. The wreath on curule chairs is a struppus, or substitute for a divine head: the pulvinar is probably that of Venus and Mars, and we may guess with some probability, that with them were associated the divi.⁴ Tripod, dolphin, and raven stand for Apollo, stars in crescent (?) for Diana. The prophetic type of Apollo is peculiarly appropriate in view of the importance of the Sibylline books on these occasions. The lighted altar (contemporary type of Domitian) will represent Vesta and perhaps Vulcan too, the 'palmettes' on throne may possibly be corn-ears for Ceres, whether or no associated on this occasion with Mercury. We have already seen that this issue was interrupted by the Great Fire, which seems to have given Domitian occasion in A.D. 81 to repeat the service of supplication.⁵

The few undated coins show the imperial Fortuna, the normal Victory on the victoriate, Divus Vespasianus as 'Victor', and the Bonus Eventus Augusti—an interesting variant of the Genius type. Bonus Eventus seems to be equivalent to the Greek 'Αγαθοδαίμων, and Nero at Alexandria had been celebrated as a Νέος 'Αγαθοδαίμων.⁶ Titus then appears to be following the tradition of Nero, perhaps with direct reference to Egypt.

⁴ A denarius of Octavian, C. 55, 43-42 B.C., with a similar reverse and legend CAESAR DIC • PER •, seems to have been struck in view of the deification of Caesar.

⁶ Cp. B. M. C., Alexandria, p. 20, Nos. 171 ff. Cp. also Pliny, Panegyric, 52. 6 'simili reverentia, Caesar, non apud genium tuum bonitati tuae gratias agi sed apud numen Iovis optimi maximi pateris.' Cp. Dio Chrysostom, Περὶ Βασιλείας 5. 6. For the type, cp. Pliny the Elder, Natural History, xxxvii. 8. 16, the work of Euphranor, 'simulacrum Boni Eventus, dextra pateram, sinistra spicam ac papavera tenens'.

Domitian proclaims himself first 'son of Augustus', then 'son of the Divus', and claims his titles of Caesar and Princeps Iuventutis. The eagle—if indeed it is a true type of this year—will represent the consecration of Vespasian: Vesta, the type of Roma Aeterna in her religious aspect, may suggest the part assigned to Domitian in the worship of his father. The fighting Minerva already appears as Domitian's patroness; the analogy of Marcus Aurelius would incline us to recognize in her too a more general type for the Crown Prince.¹ The Salus of Domitian's reverse may be Salus Populi Romani or, more probably, Salus Augusti, with reference to Titus's ill-health. This suggestion is none the less likely, because Domitian's prayers for his brother's recovery were none too sincere. The goat in a laurel-wreath is the Cretan goat, Amalthea, the nurse of the infant Jupiter, who is the natural type of the Emperor to be.² Of the altar and the helmet on table as parts of the pulvinaria series we have already spoken. The clasped hands holding legionary eagle on prow—a 'Concordia Militum'—appealing to fleet as well as army—is a bold type for any but the Emperor to use; it certainly lends colour to Suetonius's report that Domitian seriously thought of bribing the troops by a double donative to desert his brother.³

The types of Divus Vespasianus are devoted to his posthumous honours, voted by the senate (cp. the formulae EX S. C., S. C.) and perhaps accompanied by the pious wish that they might be commemorated on the coinage. A Victory by a trophy and captive records the proud honours of the Jewish triumph, a victorious quadriga, like that of Divus Claudius, was probably designed to take its place in the pompa circensis.⁴ A shield (clypeus virtutis voted S. C.) is set beside the column, on which stands the urn containing the ashes of the dead; laurels to right and left remind us of the laurels that flanked the door of Augustus—the laurels of the ever-victorious Emperor.⁵ The capricorns supporting a shield are borrowed from the sestertius struck in honour of Divus Augustus by Tiberius.⁶ Is it possible that Vespasian may have claimed the capricorn as his own natal sign?

Vespasian privately may have found the idea of consecration amusing (cp. the famous story of Suetonius: 'Vae, puto, deus fio'), but there could never be any question of the new dynasty renouncing this form of lasting honour. Thus Pliny (Natural History, ii. 7. 18) says confidently: 'deus est mortali iuvare mortalem, et haec ad aeternam gloriam via. hac proceres iere Romani, hac nunc caelesti passu cum liberis suis vadit maximus omnis aevi rector Vespasianus Augustus fessis rebus subveniens.'

Diva Domitilla is associated with reverses of the imperial Fortuna, which has raised her family to such honour, of the peacock, the bird of Juno, to whom the 'diva' is assimilated, and of 'Pietas Augusta', laying her right hand on a small figure of Spes. 'Pietas Augusta', here, will be Domitilla herself, presiding, like the very spirit of mother-love, over the princes, the hopes of her line. The type is far more appropriate to Domitilla the wife than to Domitilla the daughter of Vespasian.

Julia, like Domitian, has types of Salus and Vesta—the latter more especially appropriate if Julia, like many other princesses, received the honours of the Vestal Virgins. The type of Venus Victrix, taken over by Titus from the Julio-Claudian line, is now transferred to that proud beauty, his daughter.

Types and Legends. Aes.

This coinage has a rich content of its own, showing very little connexion with the gold and silver. A large part is played by types relating to the accession and the Flavian dynasty; there are a few references to definite events in past or present and, finally, there are a number of more general types that define the tendencies of the reign.

A type of 'Providentia Augusti' shows Vespasian, now a god, handing over to Titus the 'regimen orbis', symbolized by a globe over a rudder. 'Providentia' is the virtue of wise foresight, which leads an Emperor to make the succession sure.¹ Another type shows Titus receiving from Roma the palladium, the symbol of her eternity. Titus is mounted on horseback, and the occasion may be his formal entry (adventus) into Rome after his accession. A type of 'Pietas Augusta' shows Titus and Domitian clasping the right hands of fellowship under the blessing of Pietas. That this fraternal affection in the imperial family was something of a sham was perhaps the fault of Domitian alone.² Our present type, together with the recurring types of Spes, suggests that Titus gave Domitian his full due as heir to the throne. The 'Aeternit. Aug.' of the As celebrates the consecration of Vespasian. Aeternitas holds sceptre and cornucopiae, the attributes of majesty and prosperity, while the globe under her foot shows that the application of the type is world-wide. Stress is laid more on the great future than on the great past of the Flavian line. Sestertii of Titus and Divus Vespasianus show the effigy of the dead Emperor, drawn on a quadriga of elephants in the pompa circensis, and a statue of him enthroned as 'pacifer'.¹ The carpentum dedicated to the 'memory of Domitilla' is one of the normal honours paid to the Empress after death.² Domitilla is evidently dead, but not consecrated. It is impossible to say whether the Domitilla in question is the mother of Titus (probably the 'diva Domitilla' of the silver) or his sister of the same name.

¹ Cp. Vogt, Die alexandrinischen Münzen, pp. 109 ff. The tessera, described by Rostovtseff, Tesserarum . . . Plumbearum Sylloge, p. 16, no. 100 (Pl. II. 18) with obr. Altar, PROVIDENTIA, rev. TR • POT, group of three men and a woman, seems to refer to the bestowal of tribunician power on a newly adopted colleague in the Empire. We must distinguish the 'providentia deorum', which gives the world the benefit of imperial rule. (Cp. inscription quoted in Cl. R., 1927, p. 119.)

There is nothing very surprising in the reappearance of the type of Judaea Capta, commemorating Titus's one great military exploit. An interesting feature of this restoration is the yoke ('iugum'), the symbol of defeat, in the field. A triumph type and a type of the Capitol, if really struck for Titus at all, are decidedly rare.

The most interesting coin of the reign celebrates the completion of the Flavian amphitheatre or Coliseum in A.D. 81. The obverse represents Titus as the successful general whose victories have been crowned by peace, the reverse offers a bird's-eye view of the great rotunda, with a fountain (the Meta Sudans) on the left, and a part of a detached building on the right.³

The rest of the coinage is inspired by the emotions aroused by the celebration of the vows undertaken for the first five years of the new reign. The sacrifice to the Genius of the people, the altar dedicated to Salus Augusti, the types of Roma Victorious and Roma Valorous (with Victory or parazonium), the parallel types of Felicitas Publica and Felicitas Augusti, both with the attributes of majesty and prosperity—one and all are appropriate to the occasion. So too the type of Vesta represents the religion of the state, while 'Securitas Augusti' may extend the conception of Salus.

The general tone of the coinage is the same as that of Vespasian—peace, based on victory, and prosperity and credit as a result. Of the Victory types one, with the foot on the prow, is taken over from Vespasian, ¹ Cp. coins of Divus Augustus, struck by Tiberius, B. M. C., Emp., i, pp. cxxxiv, cxxxvii, 130, 134 ff. The fact that the Mausoleum of Divus Augustus had opened of its own accord was afterwards interpreted as a sign of Vespasian's death (Dio lxvi. 17) and gossip of this kind would naturally lead to a comparison of the two Emperors.

² Cp. Suetonius, Divus Vespasianus, 3.

³ Cp. again Dio lxvi. 25, and Suetonius, Divus Titus, 7. Cp. also Cassiodorus, Chronicon; Martial, De Spect. liber i, praise of the Coliseum. See Richter, Topographie der Stadt Rom, in Iwan von Müller's Handbuch der klassischen Altertums-Wissenschaft; Cozzo in Architectura, &c., ii, 1923, pp. 273 ff.; Ashby, T., Roman Architecturae, 1929.

the other, with shield inscribed S.P.Q.R., is the common type of Nero.¹ The care for the corn-supply is still attested by a type of Ceres and by a new type of Annona. The cornucopiae, modius, and prow are all familiar attributes of the goddess, but the statuette of Aequitas, held in the right hand, is new and enlightening. Aequitas must represent primarily the just dealing of the Emperor in supplying Rome with corn; while the reference to the free dole to the body of state pensioners is prominent, we need not limit it to that; the whole city looks to the Emperor to maintain the health of the corn-market. The sestertius, on which this type occurs, is always without the letters S.C.; it was presumably struck by the Emperor himself in connexion with his administration of the corn-supply. The 'Aequitas' of the As is a detail detached from this type.

Domitian strikes a number of his brother's types—Aequitas, Ceres, Pax, Salus, Securitas, Vesta, and Victory. Domitian as heir shares in the general policy of the government, even it seems in the distributions to the people. More appropriate to him are the mounted type of the 'princeps iuventutis', the type of the imperial Spes, and the type of his own patroness, Minerva. 'Concordia' promises loyal co-operation with his brother.

The coinage of Divus Vespasianus passes in rapid review the objects dearest to the heart of the dead Emperor—the succession of his sons (Spes, Concordia), the care for the corn-supply of Rome and the finances of the state (Ceres, Aequitas, Fides), peace (Pax), and the state religion (Vesta, Aeternitas), in which he himself now receives a permanent part.

Julia has types of 'Concordia Augusta', the family affection that unites the imperial house, and of Ceres and Vesta, the two goddesses to whom flattery assimilates her.

The 'restored' series of Titus served a double purpose; it preserved the memory of famous coins of the early Empire which were becoming obsolete, and it emphasized in the public mind the continuity between the Flavian dynasty and its predecessor.² We have already seen that the echoing of types of Augustus was one of the main features of the coinage of Vespasian.³ But Vespasian had almost confined his attention to gold and silver and gave no indication of restoration beyond the type itself. Titus restores only aes and definitely announces what he is doing by a legend stating that he has 'restored' the coin. Emperor and senate evidently act in co-operation over the issue; for, while the S.C. as usual attests the authority of the senate, the 'restoration' formula is in the name of the Emperor.

The style of the series is that of the reign of Titus, but the types are closely copied from the originals. The list of persons whose coins were to be restored was evidently drawn up with deliberate care. Tiberius, Claudius, and Galba are included, Caligula, Nero, Otho, and Vitellius omitted. The list is something like a roll of honour of the early Empire, preserving all memories that deserved to be remembered. The only omissions which seem to require explanation are those of Antonia, Nero Caesar, and Drusus Caesar. It is at least possible that the 'Pietas' of Drusus preserved, or was thought by Titus's mint-master to preserve, the features of Antonia.¹ Nero Caesar and Drusus Caesar played no large part in the state, and are only portrayed on a coin of their brother Caligula; to this their omission may be due.

Of the types, those of Divus Augustus are especially appropriate in view of the consecration of Divus Vespasianus, which was evidently modelled on that of his predecessor. The 'Spes' of Claudius was probably chosen because of its reference to the heir, Britannicus. Titus had been brought up with Britannicus and had in fact lived in such close intimacy with him that he narrowly escaped sharing his death by poison. On coming to the throne he revived the memory of his boyhood's friend and dedicated a statue in his honour.² It now appears highly probable that the very rare sestertius of Britannicus, usually assigned to the last years of Claudius, was actually struck on this occasion.³ Its appearance in or about A.D. 54, when the mint was issuing no aes, has always been a mystery—not really explained by the ingenious theory that it was struck as a definite piece of propaganda in favour of Britannicus. If we transfer the coin to A.D. 80, difficulties disappear. Titus, while honouring the well-deserving members of the imperial line, naturally thinks of his friend, who missed the honours—including that of coinage—that were his due. He cannot 'restore' what was never issued, but he chooses the next best course—he strikes for Britannicus the coin that Claudius ought to have struck for him, naming him Caesar and son of the Emperor and placing on the reverse Mars as the author of the victory that gave Britannicus his name.

significant. The lesson of the Gallic revolt and its suppression was not to be forgotten.

MINT OF ASIA (EPHESUS?).

Denominations.

R. 'Cistophoric tetradrachm' (= three denarii).

Attribution and Style.

The tetradrachm, not issued by Nero and only known in one specimen for Vespasian, was now reintroduced. The denomination determines within narrow limits the mint of the coins. The style remains much the same as in earlier reigns, but it is not certain whether we can trace the individual style of Ephesus.

Chronology and Types.

The coinage probably only begins in A.D. 80 and may continue into the next year. The legionary eagle and standards of Titus recall his military prowess in the East. Domitian appears mounted on horseback as 'princeps iuventutis' and also represents an altar, dedicated, probably in Asia, to Divus Vespasianus.

Attribution and Style.

Apart from the cistophoric tetradrachms of Asia, a small series of aes from Lugdunum and occasional barbarous coins, the coinage of Domitian was concentrated in the one mint of Rome. The style is at first that of the reign of Titus—neat and fine, but lacking in vigour; during the reign it develops new strength and freedom and, by the close, reaches a very high artistic level. The style of the aes is hardly to be distinguished from that of the gold and silver. Much skill is shown here in the composition of groups for the reverses of the sestertius.

We have seen above that there was probably an intermission of coinage in all metals in the last year of Titus—attributable to damage caused by the great fire of A.D. 80. Domitian, on his accession, struck at once in all metals. His aes of A.D. 81–82 has a series of reverses parallel to those found in gold and silver. But, after a complete intermission in A.D. 83, the aes coinage is resumed in A.D. 84 with a range of new reverse types quite unlike those of the precious metals; among them is 'Moneta August.', now appearing for the first time. Clearly a chapter of mint history is written here, if we can only read it aright, and it may be worth while to make the attempt. By the end of the reign of Titus the imperial mint, which had suffered damage in the fire, was ready to resume work, whereas the senatorial, which had also suffered, was still out of action. For two years the senatorial mint was merged in the imperial, until, finally, it was moved back to its old quarters on the Capitol, now restored. The intermission of A.D. 83 represents the period of transference and settling down in the new building. The evidence, slight as it is, is rather against the permanent housing of the two mints under one roof: the senatorial mint probably continued to be in the temple of Juno Moneta on the Capitol. The legend 'Moneta August.', occurring on the aes, suggests something like imperial control of the coinage, and this is in itself probable. The difference that is still to be marked between the types of the two coinages makes a complete identification of the two unlikely.¹

The portrait of Domitian is rendered with vigour and truth combined.²

Chronology.

Such problems of dating as arise out of the elaborate system of Domitian's numbered consulships, tribunician powers, and acclamations as 'imperator', are dealt with in the table on pp. lxxx, lxxxi. We notice a natural tendency for coinage to fall mainly in the first half of a year.³

The few undated coins are not hard to place. A small group of gold and silver, with early portraits of Domitian and the early arrangement of obverse legend (right to left),⁴ fall within the years A.D. 81 and 84. The late group, with temples on the reverses, may be dated by style and subject to the years 94-96 B.C. In the aes coinage a number of undated quadrantes can only be very vaguely placed. The 'restoration' issues are all early and link on to the similar issues of Titus: a single dated coin is of the year A.D. 82 (COS. VIII).

There is an early group of gold and silver of Domitia, alone or with her husband, datable to the years A.D. 81-83, before her divorce, and a later group, after her return to favour, c. A.D. 91-92.⁵ Her aes coinage, too, is part early, part late.

The aureus of Julia and Divus Titus is very early, perhaps A.D. 81-82, but Julia's own coinage is some years later, perhaps from about A.D. 86-91. As Julia is commemorated as 'Diva' on sestertii of Domitian of A.D. 91-92 (COS. XV, XVI), she probably died in A.D. 91. The 'Diva Iulia' coins follow this date.

The aureus of Divus Vespasian and Diva Domitilla should belong, to judge from its style, to the first years of Domitian rather than to the reign of Titus.

Types and Legends. A, R.

Domitian, like his father, uses the praenomen of imperator, combined with the dynastic title Caesar, as the preface to his title, while Domitianus is his distinctive name: later in the reign he has a shortened form DOMITIANVS AVGVSTVS, on the gold. From A.D. 83 he begins to bear the proud title of Germanicus.¹ Characteristic of the man are his insistence on his official honours—his consulships, his tribunician power, his acclamations as emperor. Of his twenty-two acclamations, sixteen are recorded.² It may be suggested that those victories in particular are recorded, in which the Emperor could be considered to have a personal part and that the acclamations not recorded on coins (IMP. III, IIII, VI, VII, X, XX) were mainly for victories won by Domitian's legates and ranked accordingly as inferior.

The types of A.D. 81–82 are, in the main, a continuation of the pulvinaria issue of Titus.³ The occasion for the second lectisternium may naturally be seen in the Great Fire of A.D. 80. Types of Minerva, the patron-goddess of Domitian, already appear—whether in her fighting attitude or as Victrix, with Victory and spear, or represented by a helmeted bust with the aegis.⁴ The Fortuna of the coins of A.D. 82 will be Fortuna Augusta, the Luck of the imperial family. In A.D. 83 the winged caduceus, the symbol of commercial prosperity, replaces the usual Victory on the silver quinarius. The cornucopiae of the aureus, the symbol of abundance, is only known up to now on a semi-barbarous issue. The eagle on the thunderbolt (A.D. 84) is the bird of Jupiter Conservator,⁵ the preserver of Domitian at the burning of the Capitol in A.D. 69. Undated silver quinarii show the normal Victory reverse. The 'Salus August.' of the undated denarius bears unusual attributes—the corn-ears and poppy borrowed from Ceres. Some reference to Domitian's care for Italian agriculture may be implied.

From the year A.D. 83 the coinage settles into the monotonous forms from which it was never to escape until the end of the reign. The praise of Minerva, the goddess to whom Domitian referred all his activities, is now the main theme.⁶ Year after year she is represented under her four main types (1) the fighting type ('Athena Alkis'), (2) a variant of (1), on ¹ In the traditional sense of 'victor over Germany.' The title had been hereditary in the Julio-Claudian family after Nero Drusus. Vitellius had borne it in a peculiar sense, 'the Emperor of the armies of Germany.' The poets commonly address Domitian by this name. Cp. Martial ii. 2. 3 ff.:

nobilis domito tribuit Germania Rheno, et puer hoc dignus nomine, Caesar, eras.

² The flattery of the poets gives us the measure of the man: Silius Italicus, Punica, iii. 603–29, is a good example.

³ See pp. lxxii, lxxiii, above.

⁴ For Domitian's cult of Minerva, see below.

⁵ Cp. the undated coin with rev. eagle, Juppiter Conservator. Domitian dedicated a shrine to Jupiter Conservator (Tac. Hist. iii. 74) and a temple to Jupiter Custos (Suetonius, Domitian, 3).

⁶ The devotion of Domitian to the goddess can be amply documented from literature, cp. Dio Cassius lxxvii, 1, 2, recording the Alban festival founded in her honour; Suetonius, Domitian, 15 'Minervam quam superstitiose colebat, somniavit excedere sacrario a prow and with an owl beside her, (3) standing l., holding spear, (4) standing l., holding spear and thunderbolt. Of these, type 1 is sufficiently familiar both on Greek and Roman coins; the other three types, too, must obviously have represented familiar representations of the goddess in sculpture.¹ The four types should naturally express four distinct phases of the activity of the goddess. Type 1 will represent her as goddess of war, type 2 perhaps as goddess of the fleets, as well as the armies of Rome. Type 3 perhaps shows her in a more peaceful capacity, while type 4, which arms her with the thunderbolt, points to her as vice-gent of Jupiter. It is rather remarkable that there is not a single type of Minerva Pacifera, the goddess as patroness of the arts of peace. Clearly with Domitian the love of martial glory overshadowed his gentle ambitions: Statius could write with justice of him:

cui geminae florent vatumque ducumque
certatim laurus (olim dolet altera vinci).²

In A.D. 85 the censorship is added to the imperial title. The rare reading, CENSORIA POTESTATE, shows that the abbreviation, CENS. POT. or CENS. P., is to be taken as an ablative of description, and we may interpret TR. P. (POT.) on the same analogy.³ In this year begins that celebration of the German victories of Domitian that was to accompany the Minerva types for the rest of the reign. 'Germania Capta' is represented by a German woman, stripped to the waist, seated in deep depression, with head sunk on hand, on her oblong shield: below her is her broken spear. The pattern of the shield, the winged thunderbolt of the sky-god, is plainly visible.⁴ The triumph of Domitian is represented by a type of the Emperor in triumphal quadriga. The exceptional silver piece of eight denarii, issued for this triumph, shows Minerva seated as giver of Victory, with captive in boat to suggest the operations against the Chatti on the Rhine. If contemporaries exaggerated the importance of Domitian's German triumphs, the next generation, hostile to Domitian's memory and jealous for the military glory of Trajan, absurdly depreciated negantemque ultra se tueri eum posse, quod exarmata esset a Iove'; Quintilian x. 1. 91, Minerva, 'familiar numen' of Domitian, inspires him in poetry; Martial iv. 1. 5.

hic colat Albano Tritonida multus in auro;

vi. 10; Minerva assures the poet on behalf of Domitian, xiv. 179. Domitian now owns the aegis of Minerva; cp. vii. 1. 3 ff.

dum vacat haec, Caesar, poterit lorica vocari:
pectore cum sacro sederit, aegis erit.

It may be noted that this aegis is normally worn by Domitian on the coins.

them.¹ The conquest of the powerful tribe of the Chatti was no mean military feat. But what is more important, it was no mere vainglorious display of Roman power, but was closely bound up with the policy of improving the frontier between Rhine and Danube, which Domitian inherited from his father. Modern archaeological research has cleared Domitian's memory from the charges of his detractors.

The celebration of the Ludi saeculares of A.D. 88 was mainly reserved for the aes. The gold and silver, however, show us the little column² set up to commemorate the holding of the games and the herald of the games,³ sometimes column and herald together, with a candelabrum for sacrifice. The herald, with his round cap with feathers, his wand and his round shield, wore a costume modelled on that of the Salian priests.⁴ The five-aureus piece, once in Paris, was probably struck for presentation at the games. From this year onwards, a certain cleavage between the coinage in gold and silver may be observed: the types are the same but the legends diverge—the silver retains the long imperial title, divided between obverse and reverse, while the gold has a shorter form, DOMITIANVS AVGVSTVS—GERMANICVS COS. XIII (XV, &c.). A type of Domitian in triumphal quadriga refers to his triumph of A.D. 89.

For the rest of the reign there is little variation from the Minerva and 'Germania Capta' types. In A.D. 95 appears a new type of Minerva, not simply as 'Victrix', holding the little Victory, but as identified with the winged goddess (Ἀθηνῆ Νίκη).⁵ As no serious war was waging at the time, we are at a loss to account for this latest fancy of Domitian's moneyers. Other rare types, quoted for this year, such as the woman holding bird and caduceus, or the altar between two eagles, require confirmation. The portraiture of the obverse is fine and ambitious. Domitian is shown with an upward lift of face, which, if it does not symbolize prayer, like the 'praying' type of Constantine, certainly suggests lofty aspirations. It is perhaps not too fanciful to imagine that Domitian chose to be thought of as aspiring to the 'Flavian heaven', to which so many of his kindred had preceded him. Was the coin portrait modelled on the head of Domitian's great equestrian statue in the forum? We think of Statius's fancy:⁶

The only other types of interest are rare types of buildings,¹ commemorated, to our loss, only on the small flans of aurei and denarii. The octastyle temple on the denarius of A.D. 92 to 93 may be the temple of Divus Vespasianus, or, perhaps better, of the 'gens Flavia':² the standing figure seems to be female. The tetrastyle temple on the aureus of A.D. 95 to 96 reminds one of the temple of Jupiter Feretrius on Republican coins of Marcellinus.³ If this interpretation is correct, we should have to suppose that flattery attributed to Domitian the winning of the spolia opima, which were dedicated in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius by the Roman general who had slain the enemy chief. The victories to left and right would be very suitable. The undated denarii with temple reverses preserve the record of a number of buildings, the completion of which by Domitian is recorded in A.D. 94. We find the 'Iseum Serapeum',⁴ a tetrastyle temple of normal Roman plan, not showing the unusual features of the 'Iseum Campense' of Vespasian. The fostering of Egyptian worship in Rome was, not unnaturally, a feature of Flavian rule. A temple of Cybele—not recorded among Domitian's buildings—is marked by an unusual flat roof without pediment. The worship of Cybele, like that of Isis, was dear to the hearts of the people, and probably for this reason was encouraged by Domitian. A tetrastyle temple of Minerva, also with a flat roof, must be the Chalcidica, recorded by the Chroniclers. The goddess is represented as leading on to battle. Finally, we meet the restored Capitol⁵ and an unidentified temple of eight columns, perhaps the temple of Divus Vespasianus.

Domitia, daughter of the famous Corbulo and a fit wife for her imperious consort, has two series of coins, corresponding to the two periods, before and after her divorce.⁶ The poets hymned her as the 'Roman Juno', and the peacock, the bird of Juno, appears on her reverse.¹ The accompanying legend 'Concordia August.' testifies to her happy wedlock with Domitian, the imperial Jupiter. 'Fortuna August.' is again the Fortuna of the Flavian house, 'Pietas August.' the affection of Domitia for the little son who died in infancy. True to his design of claiming divinity for every member of the Flavian house, Domitian consecrated the boy. A charming fancy of the moneyer now shows the infant god seated, like a baby Jupiter, on the globe of the earth and stretching out his hands for the stars.²

Julia in her lifetime shared with Domitia the title of Augusta and, like her, was assimilated to Juno: the peacock appears again on her coins.³ After her death she was consecrated, and a biga of elephants at the pompa circensis was voted to her: an effigy of Julia, as Ceres or Pax Augusta, was carried on it.

In striking the aureus for Divus Vespasianus and Diva Domitilla Domitian showed that he was not behind Titus in honouring his father and mother (or sister?). To the consecration of Titus, whom he had pursued in life with jealous hatred, he opposed no obstacle, though we notice that his posthumous honours are associated with the honour of the living Julia, the niece of whom Domitian was all too fond.⁴

Types and Legends. Aes.

The imperial title always begins with Imp. Caes. and normally includes reference to the consulship and, after A.D. 85, to the censorship.

The earliest issues, A.D. 81 to 82, are mainly given up to types of Minerva, whilst the gold and silver still carry on the pulvinaria types. The general similarity of these issues to those in the precious metals has already been noted. Domitian holding the palladium is the Emperor entrusted with the destinies of eternal Rome. A type of Pax, with the caduceus of Felicitas and the column of Securitas, as well as her own branch, strikes the key-note of the first years of the reign. To this period

¹ Cp. Dio Cassius lxvii. 3. 1 ff.; Suetonius, Domitian, 3, divorce and return. Cp. Statius, Silvae, iii. 4. 17 ff. (on a favourite of Domitian)—

Cp. a valuable article on the type by Dieudonné in Mélanges Numismatiques, i, pp. 1 ff. There is a doubt about the date of the boy's birth: Suetonius, Domitian, 3, places it in Domitian's second consulship, whereas Martial vii. 3 might seem to imply a date in Domitian's own reign.

³ Cp. Martial vi. 13, on a statue of Julia: ut Martis revocetur amor summique Tonantis | a te Iuno petat ceston et ipsa Venus.

will belong the sestertii of Domitian and Divus Titus, with Titus represented, like Augustus and Vespasian, as the author of the 'Pax Augusta', now translated to the heavenly sphere. It is curious to notice the uncertainty that prevails up to the last about the form of his title: T. DIVO AVG. and DIVO AVG. T. both occur, but not the more obvious DIVO T. AVG.

After a complete intermission for one year (A.D. 83) the coinage resumes on new lines, showing little connexion with gold and silver. The issues of A.D. 84 are restricted to the smaller denominations, dupondius and As. A 'Mars Victor', with Victory and trophy, a Victory carrying a shield inscribed S. P. Q. R.¹ or a legionary eagle—perhaps recovered from the enemy, attest the triumphs of the war against the Chatti. Domitian himself adds the name 'Germanicus' to his title and never abandons it again. 'Jupiter Conservator', who is represented on the gold by his eagle, appears here as a standing figure. As he had preserved Domitian in A.D. 69 from the perils of civil war, so now he has preserved him against the foreign foe. The altar of the shrine type,² with legend SALVTI AVGVSTI, was undoubtedly dedicated by the senate, perhaps on the occasion of the safe return of Domitian from the German wars.

Moneta, with her scales and cornucopiae, is a type new to the coinage, which is repeated from this year to the end of the reign. She is no longer closely associated with any ordinary type of Juno,³ but is assimilated to Aequitas, the spirit of imperial 'fairness', seen in just distributions to the people. 'Moneta Augusti' the 'mint goddess of the Emperor', must clearly symbolize the right control and output of money. In particular, we have to think of the Emperor as paymaster of the troops and giver of bounties to the people of Rome. Domitian raised the pay of the troops by a third to twelve aurei per annum; he gave three bounties of three aurei each to the people,⁴ and, further, he restored the aureus to the old standard of before Nero's reform and slightly improved the weight and fineness (?) of the silver. The type of Moneta, then, represents a permanent feature of the policy of Domitian, which he was resolved to keep before the public eye—the care for the people and the army, by which he won support against the hatred of the Roman aristocracy.⁵

² B. M. C., Emp., i, p. cxi, and note 2. Martial (ii. 91. 1 ff.) hailed Domitian himself as 'rerum certa salus terrarum gloria, Caesar, | sospite quo magnos credimus esse deos'.

A second type that will meet us year by year is that of Virtus, the spirit of martial valour, the symbol of that forward military policy, which ruled Domitian from A.D. 83 to almost the close of his reign. Virtus is here, as usually, a goddess, but represented in Amazon attire, like Roma, to whom she is closely akin.¹ Her characteristic attribute is the short sword, worn at the belt, the parazonium—the weapon of hand to hand combat. Virtus has her seat beside the throne of Jupiter, whose missions she executes.² But Virtus Augusti is a special aspect of the goddess, the martial spirit that inspires the Emperor's own achievements.

A third recurring type is that of Fides Publica, with corn-ears and basket of fruit,—an idea familiar from the reign of Vespasian.³ The word 'Fides' has a wide scope and includes the ideas that we express by the words 'loyalty', 'integrity', 'honour'. Probably 'credit', in a wide sense, is the nearest English equivalent. If, as seems probable, the type is closely associated with the Emperor's activities as censor, we can at once understand its popularity under Domitian. The censorship of Domitian is usually represented as a device to secure control of the composition of the senate. But this was certainly only part of its significance. Domitian was simply carrying on from his father Vespasian the policy of close attention to the business affairs of the state and, in making himself censor for life, he was offending susceptibilities rather than serious interests. In view of the care of Domitian for the Italian land we can perhaps explain the 'agricultural' attributes of Fides.⁴ It appears certain that the Flavians developed a financial policy of great importance, of Chronographer of A.D. 354, ter * LXXV. The later history of Moneta requires a careful study. It is noteworthy that Julia Domna, almost the only Empress who was in some sense a co-ruler with her husband, has 'Moneta' types (C. 143 ff.). So too have Commodus, Septimius Severus, and Caracalla, who all raised the military pay. For other Emperors—Hadrian, Antoninus Pius—the meaning is more general. The Restitutor mon. type of Severus Alexander (C. 516) probably refers to his reform of the coinage—consisting mainly in the abandonment of the Antoninianus.

¹ Cp. B. M. C., Emp., i, p. clxxiii, and note 1, ccv (where the unusual fact that a male Virtus is represented is not brought out).

² Statius, Thebais, x. 632 ff. (Virtus inspires Menoceus):

Diva Iovis solio iuxta comes, unde per orbem rara dari, terrisque solet contingere, Virtus, seu pater omnipotens tribuit, sive ipsa capaces elegit penetrare viros, caelestibus ut nunc desiluit gavisia plagis.

Domitian is, of course, one of the 'virii capaces'. Cp. Statius, Achilleis, i. 14 ff. (address to Domitian) 'At tu quem longe primum stupet Italia virtus, | Graiaque . . .'

³ For the conception of Fides as a goddess, cp. Silius Italicus ii. 475 ff., vi. 131 ff., 467 ff., xiii. 281 ff.

which only the barest hints have come down to us. The fact that a festival of Fides fell on the first day of October, the month which was rechristened 'Domitianus'¹ in A.D. 84, lends a further appropriateness to the type.

A fourth recurring type may be noted here, though it actually only makes its appearance a little later—Fortuna Augusta, the Luck of the Imperial Family. The general meaning of the type has already been discussed under the reign of Vespasian.² Domitian not unnaturally adopts it as one of the key-notes of his reign. The reason for its appearance at this precise time is not known: possibly it may have some connexion with the dedication of the temple of the gens Flavia.

The *Annona Aug.*³ of the dupondius is a type that needs interpretation. Annona herself, the spirit of the corn-supply, and the ship, the symbol of the overseas corn, are familiar: but who is the small figure who stands before her? He is certainly no child, but only a man reduced to tiny proportions beside the goddess; and the fact that he is bare to the waist may suggest that he is an Italian farmer.⁴ If this interpretation is right, the type records a definite policy of Domitian to encourage the growing of corn in Italy.⁵ The revival of the beautiful group of Nero's sestertius in A.D. 85 ('Annona Augusti Ceres', now with legend 'Annona August.') attests in more general fashion the care of the Emperor for the corn of Rome.⁶ To the same context belong the types of the quadrans, Ceres on obverse, modius and corn-ears on reverse.

In A.D. 85 begins the great series of sestertii, characteristic of the reign, on which the German victories are elaborately celebrated. A type of Germania Capta presents male and female captives standing and seated by a trophy, in conventional attitudes of mourning: the type is closely modelled on the Iudaea Capta of Vespasian,⁷ but the German element is indicated by the heavy angular cloak worn by the man and by the oblong shields. Thanks are offered to Jupiter Victor, the giver of victory: while the goddess Victory herself is represented inscribing on a shield the proud boast, 'De Germanis'.⁸ Then appears Domitian himself, as warrior riding down a struggling foe, as general in the field with Rhine submissive at his feet,⁹ as merciful victor gracefully accepting the submission of a German, pleading for mercy.¹ A triumphal arch, surmounted by quadriga of the imperial elephants, is one of the many with which Domitian overcrowded Rome.² The type of Pax setting fire to a pile of arms has already been discussed under Vespasian.³ Minerva is not represented here by her own types, as on the gold and silver, but by a type that recurs year by year of Domitian sacrificing before the goddess in a little shrine.⁴ While recording his achievements, Domitian does not omit to acknowledge the goddess to whom they are due.

The type of Domitian clasping hands with an officer over an altar, while soldiers and standard-bearer attend, is not obvious in its significance. The fact that it was in this year that Agricola returned from Britain to Rome⁵ might tempt us to see a reference to the welcome home of the successful general; and a careful reading of Tacitus himself in his Agricola will hardly convince us that such an honour was impossible.⁶ But the details of the type do not really bear out this suggestion, and the recurrence of the type in following years forces us to seek a more general explanation. Sir Charles Oman has suggested to me that the scene represented might be the establishment of a new legion. But, again, the type does not quite fit such a scene, and the Legio I Minervia, the new creation of Domitian, perhaps only came into being in A.D. 87. Probably it is the taking of the sacramentum, the military oath, that is represented; the army will be fitly expressed by a legate, an aquilifer, a signifer, and a legionary, and the clasping of hands over an altar is as fitting a symbol of the oath of allegiance as we could imagine.⁷ It is indeed rather remarkable that the intimate bond between Emperor and army should be recorded on a senatorial coin. But we must remember that Domitian clearly had some control over the coinage, and that the senate, even within its own sphere, was subservient enough, while Domitian lived: on practical

The Apollo of the quadrans, with lyre, raven or tripod and python on reverse, is probably an allusion in advance to the Saecular Games ordained by the Sibylline Books.¹

Apart from the great issues for the Saecular Games of A.D. 88, to which we shall come back later, the coinage produces little more that is new. A sestertius of A.D. 86 shows Domitian, crowned by Victory and holding the thunderbolt of Jupiter, which has no doubt been given him by his patroness Minerva. In the adulation of the poets better Emperors than Domitian were made equal to the gods; but the more prosaic language of the coins usually disregarded these excesses and was content to suggest a parallel between Emperor and gods. The modesty of the type of Trajan that shows him under the protection of Jupiter forms a striking contrast to Domitian's vanity.² Domitian evidently went further in this direction than ordinary taste would allow.³ The type of Aeternitas⁴ (Aeternitati Aug.), holding heads of Sun and Moon, marks the worship of the Flavian family that culminated in the dedication of the templum Flaviae gentis; 'Felicitas Publica' on the dupondius of A.D. 86 may perhaps have reference to the agon Capitolinus, while the very rare type of the As, an altar-shrine with attendant priests and legend Pacis, alludes to the end of the Chattan war and perhaps to the dedication of a statue of the goddess in the great temple erected to her by Vespasian.⁵ The Minerva and owl of the semis certainly refer to the agon Capitolinus, in which the honour of the goddess was prominent.⁶ A rare As of A.D. 87 revives an early imperial form of reverse, with S.C. as the main type, surrounded by imperial legend: of the occasion—probably some special vote of the senate in honour of Domitian—we know nothing.

In A.D. 88 to 89 the type of Jupiter Victor is exceptionally accompanied by the legends *Iuppiter Custos*⁷ and Iovis Virtuti. Jupiter Custos who appears on a sestertius of A.D. 86, holding a thunderbolt, is the protector of the Emperor from danger¹: the only unusual feature here is the Victory as his attribute. 'The Virtus of Jupiter' is more unusual: but if we remember that Virtus is thought of as attending on the throne of Jupiter and that Virtus can, in a special sense, be related to the person of the Emperor, we shall find no difficulty in accepting a Virtus, similarly related to Jupiter. There is but scanty reference to the stirring events of these years—the revolt and suppression of Antonius Saturninus and the wars against Dacians and Marcomanni. In A.D. 90 to 91 the arch with quadriga of elephants is repeated and at the same time begin the issues in honour of Julia, now dead and consecrated as a goddess. She receives the honour of a carpentum, already granted to the elder Agrippina by Caligula and to Domitilla by Titus.²

A variant of the 'Emperor and Victory' type introduces Minerva, as a third in the picture: in the presence of the goddess Domitian decently forbears to carry the thunderbolt. The type is quite a modest reference to the conclusion of the somewhat indecisive war against the Suevi and Sarmatae. The coinage of A.D. 95 and 96 introduces types of Jupiter—the eagle, and of Minerva—the helmet, shield and olive-tree: we miss the peacock of Juno, the third in the Capitoline Triad.

The undated quadrantes are mainly of conventional pattern and repeat types that have already been commented on. The rhinoceros was first exhibited in Rome by Domitian and aroused great popular excitement. Martial has devoted several epigrams to the subject.³

Looking back on the coinage of the reign, we can only partially endorse the ancient verdict on Domitian's vanity and megalomania. He certainly treats the victory over the Chatti at considerable length—but then there is every reason to believe that it was no mean achievement. The difficult and hazardous campaigns by which Domitian in later years strove to secure a settled frontier on the Danube are meagrely recorded—certainly without exaggeration. The one ugly feature is the vanity that leads Domitian to take over for himself a divine attribute—the thunderbolt. On the whole, we find that hatred of Domitian's personality led Romans to false estimates of his policy.

The Saecular Games celebrated by Domitian in A.D. 88 were linked on to the celebration by Augustus in 17 B.C. The Games held by Claudius in A.D. 48, which were really in honour of the eight hundredth year of Rome, were left out of account.⁴ Thanks to the discovery of parts of an inscription relating to the Games of Augustus and to the very able commentary of Dressel on the coins connected with it, we now find the types of Domitian easy to interpret.¹ The coinage of Domitian provides an almost complete record of the occasion. The herald has already met us on the gold and silver. One sestertius (p. 392, nos. 419 ff.) shows the reception of fruges—wheat, oats, and beans—from the people by Domitian, acting as one of the XVviri sacris faciundis: another sestertius (p. 394, no. 428) shows the other preparatory ceremony—the distribution of purifying elements (suffimenta) to the people. The sacrifice of the first day—a white ox to Jupiter—is represented on the As (p. 397, no. 438): that of the first night—a black sheep and goat to the Moirae—on a dupondius (p. 395, no. 430). For the second day the sestertius (p. 393, no. 424) shows Domitian dictating to the matrons the prayer to Juno²: the As (p. 396, nos. 434 ff.) the offering of cakes to the Ilithyiae. For the third day we have the choral procession of boys and girls in honour of Apollo and Diana on the sestertius (p. 394, no. 426), for the third night the sacrifice of a black sow with young to Terra Mater on the sestertius (p. 393, no. 425). The scenes of sacrifice are usually of the same general pattern. The Emperor himself dominates the scene, flute-players and harp-players are in attendance, while victimarii bring up the appropriate victims. The locality is usually indicated by a temple in the background. We know from the inscription that the reception of fruges, the distribution of suffimenta, and the sacrifices by day took place by the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, the sacrifices by night in the wooden theatre by the Tiber at its narrowest point. The fruges were also received by a temple on the Palatine and the temple of Diana on the Aventine, the suffimenta also distributed by the same temple on the Palatine. The choir sang the hymn to Apollo both on the Palatine and before the Capitol. The buildings shown on the coins do not, however, lend themselves to exact identification.

The coinage of Domitia is all of the early years of the reign and celebrates her throughout as the 'mother of the divine Caesar', the boy she had lost in infancy. As mother of the little god Domitia herself appears in divine guise, as Ceres, with corn-ears and sceptre, as Concordia Augusta, with patera and sceptre, as Pietas Augusta with sceptre and child by her side.

The 'restoration' series falls very early in the reign and is little more than a weak continuation of that of Titus. The only persons included are Divus Augustus, Tiberius, Agrippa, Drusus, Germanicus, and Claudius. After his first years Domitian certainly lost any interest that he ever had in preserving the continuity of the imperial succession.

MINT OF LUGDUNUM.

Denominations.

Aes. Orichalcum. Sestertius, Dupondius.
Copper. As.

Attribution and Style.

See above on Mint of Rome.

Chronology.

The series does not extend beyond A.D. 82, and is not represented after the reorganization of the Roman mint. It is probable that the disorganization caused at Rome by the fire had thrown more work than usual on this branch mint. The reorganized mint of Rome was apparently strong enough to dispense with its services.

Types.

The types of Mars, Roma, and Pax have all a clear reference to the special conditions of Gaul, not so long since won back by Mars Ultor for the 'Roman peace'. The type of Ceres suggests that Domitian's land-policy concerned the provinces too.

MINT OF ASIA.

Denominations.

A. Tetradrachm (= 3 denarii).

Attribution and Style.

The style is a continuation of that of Titus. The exact mint is uncertain: it may be Ephesus.

Chronology.

The dated coins of Domitian are of A.D. 81, 82, and 95, his undated partly before, partly after the end of A.D. 83 (with and without the title 'Germanicus'). The coins of Domitian and Domitia are all early, A.D. 81-82. The undated coins of Domitia and Julia all fall to the first few years of the reign.

Types.

The temple of Roma and Augustus, with the Emperor standing, crowned by a woman, is taken over from the coinage of Claudius.¹ The bundle of corn-ears—obvious symbol of agricultural prosperity—comes from Augustus and continues after Domitian to be characteristic of the series.¹ The military type, a legionary eagle and standards, is new and perhaps surprising for the 'unarmed' province of Asia. A view of the restored Capitol (A.D. 82) gives a representation, markedly different from that on Roman coins, showing four columns in place of six.²

Domitia is shown as 'Venus Augusta' with the attributes of Venus Victrix, while Julia shares in the honours of Vesta.

DENSITIES AND ANALYSES

The specific gravity of a few coins has been taken as a test of their composition.

An aureus of Vespasian showed a density of well over 19—implying that it is practically pure, without alloy.

Denarii of Vespasian showed densities of 8.92, 9.63, and 9.97; denarii of Domitian's later period 9.58 and 9.69. These are within the normal range of densities of denarii of the reform of Nero. It hardly seems possible that Domitian made any marked change in the fineness of his silver.

A cistophoric tetradrachm showed a density of 9.42, one of Titus 10.18, one of Domitian 9.56. This denomination was evidently alloyed to much the same extent as the Roman silver.

A few analyses have been made, which confirm results already obtained. A dupondius of Vespasian of the mint of Lugdunum contained 77.38 per cent. copper, 0.14 per cent. lead, 0.04 per cent. tin, 18.33 per cent. zinc. A dupondius of Vespasian of the mint of Commagene contained 74.89 per cent. copper, 0.16 per cent. lead, 0.09 per cent. tin, 22.43 per cent. zinc. A sestertius of Domitian of the mint of Rome contained 81.56 per cent. copper, 0.64 per cent. lead, 0.38 per cent. tin, 15.90 per cent. zinc, an As of Domitian of the mint of Rome 98.88 per cent. copper, 0.25 per cent. tin, no lead or zinc.

HISTORICAL

TEXTS. The main ancient authorities are Tacitus, Histories (also, in a less degree, the Agricola and Germania), Suetonius, Lives of Vespasian, Titus and Domitian, Josephus, Jewish War, and the fragments of Dio. An occasional note may be gleaned from the Natural History of the elder Pliny or from the Punica of Silius Italicus. The Epigrams of Martial and the Silvae of Statius are very valuable as secondary sources.

Finally comes the most gracious and pleasing of all one's tasks—the giving of thanks to all who have so freely and generously helped in the preparation of this catalogue. To all the curators of public museums, who have supplied casts of coins and given me permission to publish them, I would express my sincere gratitude, more especially to M. Dieudonné of Paris, Dr. Regling of Berlin, Dr. Loehr and Dr. Pink of Vienna, and Dr. Hoffiller of Zagreb. Dr. Alföldi of Budapest, Dr. Bernhart of Munich, and M. Tinchant of Nîmes, have all given me most generous and valuable assistance in the collection of materials. Private collectors have, as always, readily lent all the help in their power; if I select for special thanks the names of Mr. H. P. Hall, Dr. L. A. Lawrence, and Mr. F. A. Walters, they must stand as representatives of the many others who have helped.

Among published works, I have found particular help in the writings of Dr. Behrendt Pick of Gotha on the Flavians and of Signor Laffranchi of Milan on Vespasian. Other debts are, I trust, fully acknowledged in the bibliography. The Rev. E. A. Sydenham has discussed many of the problems with me and I have profited greatly by a free exchange of ideas with him.

All that I owe to the Medal Room and my colleagues in it may be summed up in my thanks to my chief, Dr. G. F. Hill. This is the second numismatic voyage that I have made with him and I have found him as certain in judgement and as keen in friendly criticism as ever.

69. George III Gift, 1823. The style is a little suggestive of that of the Uncertain Eastern Mint, that signs with O: if the O under VESP is not due to a flaw in the die, the coin should go with that mint. Owing to its early date, as compared with the silver of that mint, it is classed provisionally under Rome.

* A sestertius in the F. A. Walters Coll. (393-1, 25-47—Pl. 81. 3) has normal obr. of this year, rev. S. C., Decastyle temple above: below, on second level, front wall, with doorway and niches, and flanking walls: on lowest level, front wall with central arch and flanking walls.

The surface of the coin is honeycombed with holes, but does not look like that of a cast. The edge has been hammered up and the rev. type seems to be slightly sunk. It is perhaps more likely that the interesting type is due to a clever forger (very possibly not a modern one) than to the official Roman die-sinker: but it seems only just to submit it to the judgement of students.

CORRIGENDA

- On p. lxvii, the 'Uncertain Mint' is, in all probability, Tarraco.
- On p. 17, to no. * n., add 'C. 596, quoting Paris specimen, gives rev. AVGVST., apparently in error.'
- On p. 75, no. * n., for 'R.B., 1882, p. 402' read 'R.B., 1882, p. 403.'
- On p. 106, no. *, rev., for 'T. CAES.' read 'TI. CAES.'
- On p. 135, no. ||, C. 330, obv., read 'T. P.' not 'TR. P.'
- On p. 195, to note †, add 'Obv. should read CAESAR; cp. Helbing Sale, 20 March 1928, lot 503.'

On p. 237, cancel 'no. ‡', and transfer it to p. 252 after no. 6 A.

On p. 247, no. 144, obv., for 'draped' read 'draped, r.'

On p. 252, no. * note, correct rev. to: 'Domitian on horse galloping l., raising r. hand and holding sceptre (? spear)': cp. R.S., 1905, Pl. 17. 7.

On p. 262, no. 191 note, line 3, after 'VESPASIAN.' add 'S. C.'

On Pl. 74, nos. 4 and 5 show the same coin, accidentally repeated.

INDEX III

TYPES (INCLUDING SYMBOLS)

For the names of deities the Latin form has been invariably preferred to the Greek: thus Minerva, not Pallas. In one or two cases an Anglicized form has been adopted: thus Neptune, not Neptunus. For the names of personifications the Latin form has been used, except in the one case of Victory (Victoria). Below is given a list of personifications with their Latin and English equivalents:

Aequitas	Equity, Fair Measure, Justice.
Aeternitas	Eternity.
Annona	Corn-harvest, Plenty.
Bonus Eventus	Good Fortune, Success.
Concordia	Concord, Harmony.
Constantia	Courage, Resolution.
Felicitas	Good Fortune, Happiness.
Fides	Credit, Confidence, Faith, Loyalty.
Fortuna	Fortune.
Hispania	Spain.
Honos	Distinction, Honour.
Iustitia	Justice.
Libertas	Freedom, Liberty.
Moneta	Mint or Money (Spirit of).
Pax	Peace.
Pietas	Dutifulness, Piety.
Salus	Safety, Salvation.
Securitas	Confidence, Security.
Spes	Hope.
Tutela	Guardianship, Protection.
Victoria	Victory.
Virtus	Courage, Valour.
